THE HISTORY OF PENNS CAVE.

Mountain comes to an abrupt end east of the cave while to the south loom the high peaks of the Seven Mountains' chain. Ex-Governor Curtin called it "Pennsylvania's greatest natural wonder." Many distinguished persons have been entertained there, including parties of foreigners. All these traveled persons who ought to know have been loud in their praises of this grand spot. When the writer was last there in the month of May the new moon was shining brightly above the Seven Mountains. It cast a ghostly light over the old orchard which surrounds the commodious hotel. Down in the deep gorge where the green limestone water rushes from the cave the whippoorwills had begun their plaintive melodies. Never did Nature look more beautiful than on this occasion. The entire demesne seemed to radiate the spirit of long ago. A mist was rising from the entrance to the cave and as the night progressed it seemed to form into the figures of the murdered Melachi Boyer and his sweetheart Nita-nee surrounded by the hostile forms of the old chief and his seven sons who would not permit a marriage between an Indian princess and a white adventurer. Then these forms seemed to fade away and in their places came those of Rev. Martin, Rev. Long, Paxton and Woods, the early explorers of the cave. Over in a distant field came the faint cadences of a killedeer's mourning. It was a night full of fancies and imaginings. It was a place where one can find relief and rest from the cares of the modern, complex life. If the fountain of youth is in Pennsylvania, surely it must have flowed out of the unbounded depths of Penn's Cave, for surely all who have been there have come away strengthened and spiritually purified by its rare beauty and precious flood of memories.
