Egg Hill School House Burned to Ground.

The Egg Hill school house, one of the largest school houses in the Potter township school district, and of brick construction, was totally destroyed by fire Saturday afternoon at four o'clock. The fire was first discovered by Boyd Lucas, who, together with George Bright, were burning brush along the public road, a distance of a hundred yards or more from the building. A spark carried by the high wind onto the roof of the school house started the blaze which ended so disastrously. All the furniture and text books were also consumed. There was no insurance. The structure was built about twenty-five years ago. Outside of being in need of a new roof it was in first-class condition. Bruce W. Ripka taught the last term and his school was a large one.

A large tree standing between the school house and Evangelical church was the only means of saving the church structure from a similar fate.

Stop It!

Complaint is being made by a number of property owners who are endeavoring to beautify their home surroundings, because of the pernicious practice on the part of boys and girls plucking tulips and other beautiful flowers from flower beds on their lawns. This practice has been going on since the first flowers were in bloom, and it behooves the parents whose children are the guilty ones to put a summary stop to it. The importance of respecting the property of others, whether it be the plucking of flowers or doing destruction of a more serious nature, cannot be too strongly emphasized. Stop it!

A TRIP TO THE SOUTHLAND.

ama we found several types of houses. The old Spanish houses are built with thick massive stone walls, with only a narrow street between. The houses are usually two stories high. Along the narrow street, some times only 14 feet wide, a pavement of about 18 inches in width may be found. Only a few of the houses open upon the street and then often by means of an iron door made of a lattice work of iron bars. They all open upon an inside Court which occupies the center of the block. On the second story of the house, porches are found. These porches are perhaps 4 feet wide and overlooking the sidewalks below. They make the narrow streets still more narrow on the second story. The old churches, forts and other buildings of long ago have, some of them, walls three or four feet in thickness. These houses are not neat and clean looking. They seem untidy and stuffy, but I was assured by those, who no doubt know, that they answer the purposes for which they are used very well. That the thick walls prevent the heat from penetrating and that the narrow streets and the porches prevents the sun from warming the streets for any great length of time during the day. The other type of buildings is like our town. There are many modern houses and streets in Havana. On the isthmus the Americans are building modern houses everywhere on the canal zone, and they have started Ancon and Balboa two new American towns on the Pacific side and one "Cristobal" on the Atlantic side. Two large American hotels have also been built. One the Washington, at Cristobal, and the other the Trivite, at Ancon.
