Must Display Lights.
The smashing up of farm wagons and horse drawn vehicles at night by automobiles will be reduced to a minimum if the Mearke bill, already passed by the Senate, is passed by the House and the indications are that it will be, although there will be some opposition by the country members. The bill provides that all vehicles must display lights at night—horse drawn vehicles as well as automobiles. It has been pointed out that numerous accidents, many of them fatal have occurred at night in the outlying districts because automobile drivers were not warned of the presence of horse drawn vehicles by lights.
Scores of farmers are writing to their members asking them to vote for the legislation but others are offering their opposition. Some of those opposed to the bill point out that they would have to go to the expense of buying an extra lantern to go on these wagons, a cost which supporters say cannot be compared with the safety they would be afforded. Others opposed, too, point out that should their lights be out and they would be struck they would be unable to claim damages as they can at present when the law does not require them to carry lights.
