Questions.

- (1) What variety of mosquito is responsible for the spread of malarial fever?
- (2) Where do mosquitoes deposit their eggs?
- (3) How may mosquitoes be eliminated?

MOSQUITOES

Madame Anopheles, pronounced (an awful ease), yawned and stretched, then with characteristic abandon proceeded to stand on her head—rather unladylike, but Madame Anopheles was a mosquito and after all that position was natural to her special family, thus differing from her cousins, the Culex's, who always stand with their slim bodies parallel to the object upon which they are resting.

Madame Anopheles had subsisted for the first two days of her life upon vegetable diet; when her instinct warned her that the eggs which were already forming in her body, would not develop unless she had a meal of blood, she sallied forth to find a victim. She floated through an open window and softly settled on the cheek of a man wrapped in the profound sleep of exhaustion following a paroxysm of the chill, fever and sweating of malarial fever.

Only a few drops of blood served to fill her stomach to distention, yet those few drops, drawn at the favorable time, contained numbers of the two elements which, only in the stomach of the Anopheles Mosquito (according to present knowledge) can combine to reproduce the Anopheles which are the active causes of malarial fever.

Soon in her body thousands of new born Anopheles were ready to be carried into the blood of the next person whose skin she punctured.

In a week Madame Anopheles, before, simply an annoyance, had become a carrier of malarial fever and a grave menace to public health.

All mosquitoes deposit their eggs in either stagnant or very slow moving water. A rain barrel—an unturned tin can—a water bucket—pitcher, anything which will hold water. A few days later the eggs split and wrigglers emerge, fuzzy, squirming, thread-like they dart about erratically, now and again coming to the surface for air. The Anopheles are equipped with short breathing tubes along the rear portion of the back. As they thrust their air tubes through the surface they are forced to assume a position almost parallel with the top of the water.

Other varieties of Mosquitoes have much longer breathing tubes situated at the extremity of the back, which cause them to hang with the head downward when taking air—in this way the Anopheles may be distinguished even in the larva or (wriggler) state.

Next comes the pupal stage when the larva changes its form somewhat and floats at the surface looking something like a curled up catfish. After a few days of this life, the skin splits and the full grown mosquito emerges.

Male mosquitoes do not bite, it is not at all a matter of preference, but because they are not so constructed that they can.

Anopheles Mosquitoes are found in all hot countries, they abound in our own southern states.

They are also found in Pennsylvania.

There is no malaria where there are no Anopheles Mosquitoes. The Anopheles can not give malaria unless it suck blood from a malarial patient. The Anopheles may be distinguished from other varieties of mosquito by their characteristic posture, standing almost on their heads and by the black specks on their wings.

Patients with malaria must be screened against mosquitoes.

Mosquitoes can be exterminated in any locality by destroying their breeding places.

Marshes should be drained, pools of standing water which cannot be drained should be covered with a thin layer of oil—kerosene or a crude oil dilution. A small quantity of oil soon distributes itself evenly over a large body of water. When mosquito larvae come to the surface to breathe, the oil fills the breathing tube and they die from suffocation. Small receptacles about the house containing water may prove excellent breeding places for mosquitoes. The drip from the back yards hydrant, the clogged rain spout, the horse trough are all favorable to mosquito breeding.

In long continued dry seasons the water traps between surface drains and sewers in towns and cities afford excellent breeding places for mosquitoes. Such traps should either be oiled after each rain or routinely flushed once a week to wash out the larvae before they have time to develop into mosquitoes.

With no Anopheles Mosquitoes there can be no malaria—with no standing water there can be no mosquitoes.
