CONSOLIDATION OF SCHOOLS A GROWING TENDENCY

14,000 Consolidated Schools Give Superior Advantages Over One-Two- and Three-Teacher Types.

Country schools in the United States are being centralized with reasonable rapidity and increasing intelligence and forethought. According to estimates recently made in the Bureau of Education of the Department of the Interior, approximately nine million children of the farm population and three million additional rural children living in small villages and other farm communities, in all twelve million children, are enrolled at schools which may properly be called rural. These schools are classified as follows: One-teacher schools, of which there were at the close of 1924 about 168,000, enrolling approximately four and three-fourths million children; two-, three-, and four-teacher schools in the open country enrolling on the same date approximately one and one-half million children; schools in villages of 500 and under enrolling approximately two and one-fourth million children; consolidated schools enrolling approximately two and three-fourth million children, and three-fourth of a million rural children enrolled in schools of the larger towns and in others not included in the above classification. It is also estimated that there are approximately 150,000 teachers now employed in 14,900 consolidated schools in the United States. That these children are receiving educational advantages superior in quality to those generally afforded by the small isolated schools of the one-, two- and three teacher type is generally acknowledged. Wherever feasible, there is a tendency, growing in strength and extent, to consolidate small rural schools.
