When the "Embattled Farmers" Made Their Famous Stand on the Bridge at Concord

Scene of the Lexington-Concord bridge battleground where one hundred and fifty years ago "the shot was fired that was heard 'round the world.'" In the foreground is the monument commemorating the Lexington engagement; on the other end of the Concord bridge is seen the Minute Men's statue to the memory of the valiant defenders of the span.

At Acton, Mass., is this monument, erected to Capt. Isaac Davis, who commanded the troops of Acton in the battle of Concord Bridge. Captain Davis was the first man killed.

Arthur F. Davis, librarian of the Acton (Mass.) public library, painted this picture of the Acton troops under Capt. Isaac Davis, leaving Acton for the Old North Bridge, Concord, at the report of the march of British troops. This picture was painted by him from records and letters that date back to the Concord battle.

THOSE acquainted with the events that led to the Revolution probably more than once have asked themselves why the 19th of April is celebrated as the anniversary of the "Battle of Lexington" rather than the "Battle of Concord." Concord was the objective point of General Gage's raid into the country, and Lexington, as well as Cambridge and Menotomy, merely happened to be on the road that led thither. Nobody in the whole province was alarmed about Lexington, but everybody was anxious for Concord and the precious war material that was stored there, the very heart and vitals of the incipient rebellion. The Minute Men of the neighboring counties, when they turned out the morning of the 19th for the defense of Concord, not of Lexington, all knew where Concord was and the roads that led there, but it is doubtful if one in a dozen had ever heard of Lexington, or at any rate knew whether it lay to the north, east, south or west of Concord.

One reason why the fight has become known as the Battle of Lexington is that the rolls of all the Minute Men who turned out from other towns are filed at the statehouse in Boston and there docketed as the "Lexington Alarms." Some years after the event an appropriation was made to pay the men who rushed to the defense of Concord for their military service and travel and the captains from all over the province sent in their attested muster rolls. Concord paid her own soldiers and there is no record in the statehouse of the men from this town who served on that eventful day.

Muster Roll of Heroes.
In February, 1901, the muster roll of Capt. Charles Miles' company of Concord Minute Men, engaged at the North bridge, April 19, 1775, was sold at auction in Boston for $275. This list of men was the only complete list of the Concord men in this particular engagement, though the names of nearly all of them appear in the town's records scattered through several pages as they were paid by the town treasurer from time to time. The names, however, are not so arranged as to make it certain to what particular company any individual soldier belonged.

The origin of the expression "Minute Men" is of interest. Practically from the beginning of the province there had been a militia composed of the entire body of citizens (with certain exceptions such as clergymen and paupers). This body of militia was mustered and paraded one or more times each year under officers whose commissions ran in the name of the king and were signed by the royal governor. Long before the outbreak of hostilities in 1775, General Gage, the royal governor of the province of Massachusetts, had become suspicious of this body and had as far as possible prevented the assembling of the militia and had discontinued the annual musters. In some cases the commissions of the militia officers were revoked, but for the most part they had not been recalled. The throttling by Governor Gage of the general court, the constituted legislature of the province, led to the assembling in Concord on the 11th of October, 1774, of a body of delegates chosen from the several towns in the same manner as the representatives to the general court were chosen. This new body of delegates called itself a provincial congress and held three sessions; the first of five days in October, the second two weeks in the same month in Cambridge and the third of nearly three weeks in November and December, also at Cambridge. One of the first proceedings of this body was to take into consideration the disorganized condition of the militia and to take measures to form a new force.

Safeguarding Liberty.
One resolution provided for the appointment of a committee of safety who should "have power and they are hereby directed whenever they shall judge it necessary for the safety and defense of the inhabitants of this province and their property, to alarm, muster and cause to be assembled, with the utmost expedition and completely armed, accoutered and supplied with provisions sufficient for their support in their march to the place of rendezvous, such and so many of the militia as they shall judge necessary for the ends aforesaid, and at such place or places as they shall judge proper, and then to discharge as soon as the safety of this province shall permit."

Other resolutions provided for the purchase of arms, ammunition, provisions and all kinds of military stores, and for their accumulation and care at Concord and Worcester. The new force was to be raised by voluntary enlistment to the extent of one-fourth of the men of military age in the province. The committee that drew up these resolutions for the congress knew perfectly well that if there was a clash of arms it would be imperative necessary to have a military force upon which they could depend, a force of men who had taken up arms of their own volition, and with full knowledge that such taking of arms might, and almost certainly would, lead to open rebellion and treason. So by the process of voluntary enlistment in the new force, the congress weeded out the loyalists from the ranks of the militia.

"At a Minute's Warning."
It was this force of men to which the name of "Minute Men" was applied, a term which appears to have been at first a popular name for the force doubtless derived from the terms of the enlistment paper which were as follows:

"I, we, whose names are hereunto subscribed, will, to the utmost of our power, defend his majesty, King George the Third, his person, crown and dignity.

"2. We will at the same time, to the utmost of our power and abilities, defend all and every one our charter rights, liberties and privileges, and will hold ourselves in readiness at a minute's warning, with arms and ammunition thus to do.

"3. We will at all times and in all places obey our officers chosen by us, and our superior officers, in ordering and disciplining us, when and where said officers shall think proper."

These terms of enlistment were drawn up by a committee of the town of Concord, and reported to a town meeting, January 9, 1775, when the town voted to pay each "Minute Man" at a certain rate a day for ten months.

From this fact it may be seen that to Concord belongs not only the honor of being the spot on which "was made the first forcible resistance to British aggression," but also of being the birthplace of the very name which for 150 years has been the synonym for a soldier of liberty.

First Provincial Congress.
There is an error in the minds of those who feel that the first provincial congress met in Salem. General Gage tried to pull the teeth of the proposed congress in Concord by issuing orders that each town should elect delegates to the general court to meet in Salem on the 5th of October. The "congress" had been called to meet in Concord on the 11th of the same month and many, if not most of the towns, had already chosen their delegates. It was plainly Governor Gage's intention to forestall the action of the congress by bringing together the legitimate and recognized assembly, over the actions of which he could possibly have control. However, many of the towns utterly refused to send any representatives to the general court, with the result that on the 28th of September Governor Gage was forced to issue a proclamation to the effect that no session of the general court would be held.

Snow Cleared by TNT

In the Rocky Mountain National park where heavy snows in winter obliterate the trails and present a big task should they have to be removed in the spring in the usual way or by melting, workmen thread a long fuse of TNT through the snow, about when the last snow has fallen, and ignite it. This clears the road in a flash. The fuse is incased in a tube of lead to preclude premature accident.

To Harness Desert Heat

Scientists who have been delving into the future of the development of natural utilities have suggested that it is feasible to harness the heat of the great Sahara desert sands. While the suggestion is a vapory one just now, scientists who look upon the idea seriously say it is hardly more impracticable than the harnessing of waterfalls seemed to be some years ago.

Seemed Wasted Time

Whistling merrily at his employment, an expert workman busied himself in combining bits of feather, horse-hair, hooks and red flannel. There came along a visitor, evidently one from the rural districts, who viewed these operations with palpable astonishment. The workman explained that he was making artificial flies. The stranger's comment was expressive. "Gosh, aren't there enough real ones in season?"

New Professions

In the ten years between the federal census of 1910 and 1920 there were only two new professions developed, so far as being recognized by the classifications of the United States census are concerned. These two were osteopathy and aeronautics. The federal bureau of the census classifies all gainful occupations according to its index, and recognizes no other officially.
