Claims for Dog Damage Must Be Fair.

Some local auditors and justices of the peace in Pennsylvania are appraising damages caused to livestock and poultry by dogs, in excess of the actual loss, according to the bureau of Animal Industry, Department of Agriculture.

Justices of the peace, aldermen, magistrates and township auditors who are charged under the law to make such appraisals are representatives of the Commonwealth and as such, should see that the appraisals are made in accordance with the actual loss sustained and not be guided by what the person suffering the loss thinks, bureau officials assert. Animals should be appraised according to their worth at the time the damage was done and not their value a year or two ago or some future value.

The bureau explains that those who make unfair appraisals seriously interfere with the prompt payment of all claims. The bureau will not tolerate the full payment of any claims which are clearly out of line with the actual loss sustained.

The bureau wishes and expects to make payment in every case to the full extent of the actual damage, but it can not be expected that a premium on such losses be paid. Continued disregard of this will lead to drastic regulations, officials asserted.
