"SHOOTING STARS" NO. 2

DUST FROM TUTTLE'S COMET

Dust from Tuttle's comet was seen flashing through the heavens, Thursday night, by local observers from the top of Nittany Mountain. The display carried on after midnight to 3:09 a. m., during which time 137 distant "shots" were seen, a few of them resembling long streaks of flying fire. The display is said to have been more elaborate this year than last, when the average number of "shooting stars" was a little better than one each minute, as observed by directors of observatories.

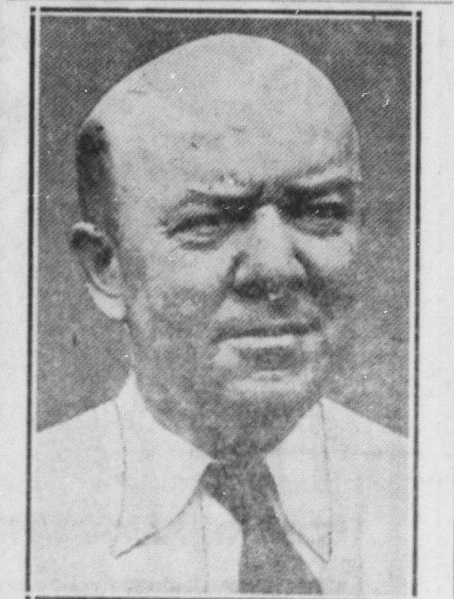

But the perseids are not really "shooting stars," they are merely particles of cosmic dust heated until they glow by friction of the earth's atmosphere. The particles were left by Tuttle's comet about a hundred years ago. The comet itself has not been seen since 1862.

The 137 count was made by W. W. Kerlin and several others who scanned the skies from a point of vantage on Old Nittany.
