PUT PULLETS IN HOUSES BEFORE LAYING STARTS

Pullets should be transferred to laying quarters just before they start to lay. These buildings should be made as cool and comfortable as possible for the birds and precautions taken not to overcrowd the pens.

The large well-developed pullets should be housed first and the others as they mature. If ready-to-lay pullets and immature ones are confined to the same pen, the smaller birds will not have an opportunity to develop properly.

Last year Ivo F. Antoniolio, Hickory, had the best score.

CLIPPING YOUNG ALFALFA MAY RUIN FUTURE GROWTH

Many beginners with alfalfa make the mistake of clipping the new seeding or attempting to harvest a hay crop from it. Unless weeds get very bad and threaten to smother the alfalfa, the field should not be clipped, says County Agent R. C. Blaney. Alfalfa needs to make as much root as possible the first season in order to withstand winter injury. To do this, the top must be left undisturbed. The roots will grow and store up nutrients until late in the fall if the top is not cut off. The old top and stubble growth help to protect the stand over winter and prevent the blowing off of snow cover. Where alfalfa grows luxuriantly, clipping or harvesting a crop the first fall may not be serious, but the beginner should take no chances. Pasturing the top off closely is as bad or worse than mowing.

Late cutting of alfalfa stands often results in winter injury. There should be at least six inches of growth left in the fall. This growth not only acts as a cover, but has helped to store the roots with necessary nutrients to survive the winter and make a vigorous start in the spring.

Almost 600 clerical lay delegates will represent thirty-four constituent synods, stretching from coast to coast in both the United States and Canada. The Rev. John F. Harkins, D.
