Take a Light Tonic

Don't blame the weather for your lack of pep. If you get tired before the day's work is half over, if you feel completely "played out," it is high time to check the seeing conditions in your office. Doctors say that inefficiency, fatigue, costly mistakes often result from eyestrain.

Now you can make a scientific test to determine what you have always guessed at—the adequacy of the light in your office. A new precision instrument called the SIGHT METER measures the intensity of light and records whether there is sufficient light for every visual task.

Hold the meter in your own hand. Watch where the indicator points. Then determine for yourself if a light tonic is needed.

A sight meter test can be made in a few minutes. It costs nothing yet it will pay you dividends in better health and efficiency throughout the year.
