By WILL ROGERS

THE birds setting around at the club was bragging about what good husbands they were. That is what they do at clubs, when they get to a certain stage in the evening's entertainment.

So the fellow that never quarreled with his wife had told his gag, and so had the one that buys her candy every birthday. Then says Jones, "Why, I ain't so good as some of you, but I reckon I ain't so bad, either. Anyhow, I sat and held my wife's hands last night for an hour."

Smith was just far enough gone so he couldn't let it go. "Why, that's funny," he says. "You know, I live right next door to you, Jones, as all these says know. And I saw you and your wife fighting something awful last night. Chairs, you were throwing, and all that."

"I didn't say we wasn't fighting a little," says Jones. "I held her hands for an hour, though, and that's the truth. I wasn't going to let her scratch my eyes out."
