A Modern Soup Kettle

No need to watch the soup when you make it in the steam cooker kettle—the controlled low heat keeps just the right simmering temperature.

By Louise Brown

THERE'S something about the first fall weather with a bit of "zip" in the air that seems to call for a steaming kettle of homemade vegetable soup. But don't let's spend the whole day puttering around with it. We'll put all the makings into the steam cooker kettle of the electric range and let it simmer all day (it doesn't need a brick walk in the kitchen to enjoy the glorious colors on every hillside.

And when the family gathers around the supper table, the satisfying main dish will be a big steaming bowl of vegetable soup. By the way, have you noticed that the old-fashioned soup tureen is back in favor again? With the soup serve a crisp salad and some simple dessert—a pudding or hot gingerbread—and you have an easy yet hearty meal.

Vegetable Soup

1 soup bone with meat on it

1/2 cup carrots

1/2 cup turnips

1/2 cup celery leaves and diced celery

1 1/2 cups potatoes

1 small onion

1 teaspoon salt

3 cups cold water

Simply place the soup bone with the water, seasonings and vegetables in the steam cooker kettle. Put the cover on the cover, turn the switch to Low and let it cook for 6 or 8 hours. This soup may be cooked 10 to 12 hours—overnight, if you like. The dependable heat control maintains just the right temperature for simmering and you can leave the kitchen with complete confidence.
