Decorative Fabrics Appear With New "Color-Tested Seal"

Courtesy DuPont Style News Service.

An attractive ivy pattern, cotton crash fabric for slip covers and draperies that has been awarded the new "Color-Tested" seal. This seal is awarded by the Better Fabrics Testing Bureau, and means that the fabric has been tested for fastness to washing and sunlight.

BY LOUISE BROWN

NOWADAYS, it's much easier to be a "good shopper." For instance, it's less difficult to select drapery and slip cover fabrics that will be color fast and stand either home washing or commercial laundering and exposure to sunlight.

The arrival of a new line of slip cover and drapery fabrics with the "Color-Tested" seal awarded by the Better Fabrics Testing Bureau, is significant as the first step in a revolutionary movement which is expected to answer the urgent need for a means of color fastness identification. Until now, with few exceptions, the consumer has had no way of knowing whether or not the colors in fabrics are fast, irrespective of the price she pays for them.

The tests conducted by the Better Fabrics Testing Bureau are based on the use to which each type of material will be put in actual home use. The award of the seal is not confined to materials colored with a particular make of dye stuffs, but depends entirely on the fastness of the dyes used and their ability to hold their color when subjected to laboratory tests.

NEW PATTERNS

In this new line of materials, there are four floral patterns, a striped design, and a plain fabric. The colors are coordinated so that figured and plain styles may be used together in perfect harmony. The "Castle Ivy" pattern shown above has large ivy leaves in light tan on rust, green, or brown—and in eggshell color on blue and plum.

It is expected that other decorative fabrics bearing the "Color-Tested" seal will shortly be available, and that eventually dress fabrics will also appear with this label of color reliability to help women shop more intelligently.
