Timely Reminders from The Pennsylvania State College

Grow Scab-free Potatoes—Housewives in general dislike scabby potatoes. A clean crop can be grown by planting disease-free seed on clean ground, claim plant disease doctors at the Penna. State College.

Add Supers to Bee Hives—Because spring flowers produce an abundant supply of nectar, Penn State extension bee specialists suggest that bee keepers inspect their hives frequently to see that the bees have plenty of supers for the storage of honey.

Controlling Tobacco Diseases—Penn State's extension plant pathologists warn tobacco growers against the use of "magic" remedies for the control of blue-mold. They recommend such time-tested remedies as copper oxide oil and Bordeaux mixture.

Soybeans High in Protein—If it appears that your alfalfa and clover hay crop will be short you can still assure yourself of a good crop of legume hay by following the advice of Penn State crop specialists to plant soybeans. Ordinarily soybeans produce 1 1/2 to 2 1/2 tons of hay per acre having approximately the same feeding value as alfalfa.

Avoid Scabby Apples—It isn't necessary to produce a crop of scabby apples, claim Penn State's extension plant disease specialists. They say that although this is a bad scab year, properly sprayed orchards have not been attacked by the scab.

There is no "liberty" surrendered in the ban on fireworks on the Fourth and the little fellow, too, may have his toy cap pistol. All very good.

EXTRA PROFITS

The difference between selling stock "for what you can get" and selling it after you have telephoned the markets and found your buyer, often amounts to many dollars. For example, one farmer called a hog buyer in the morning. He liked the price and closed the deal over the telephone. Later he found that had he waited to go to town at noon, the price would have been 10 cents a hundred less. It pays in good hard cash, to use your telephone to find your markets!
