SMITH and Jones were both going back to their stores after their goodwill luncheons. One belonged to the Rollers and the other to the Tigers. They met in the middle of the street, opposite both their stores, so they had to speak.

"See here, Jones," says Smith, "we just heard a lecture on goodwill in business, and it cost us five hundred dollars, and we got a big kick out of it. There ought to be more goodwill in business."

"Yes," says Jones, "that's all true where it ain't lies. The lecture didn't cost you anything, because the guy that talked has got calendars to sell, and we could have had him at our club only we had engaged a guy that has greeting signs to sell, and he talked on goodwill too."

"Well, anyway, what makes you sore at me, Jones?"

"I ain't sore at you. What makes you think so?"

"You gave me a mean look when we met."

"I did not. If you'll look up the records you'll find that your dad gave you that mean look, and he got it from his dad. That mean look on your mug, never grew up in one generation."
