OPERATIONS OF THE HOVING. Having some business on the Chambersburg Pike the other day, I deflected to the left at the Gate-house, and soon found myself in a narrow lane where bubbles of Gettysburg Kalyptus Spring.

It was surprising to find that the alliance and solitude which reigned here during the winter had been succeeded by bustle and activity. The water was very noisy, the tramping of many feet, the clanking of bottles and the creaking of machinery in other words, that the bottling of this water the spring trade had commenced.

While contemplating the pulling operations, my attention was attracted by the passage of men and boys and from the bottling establishment, and south the western portion of the glade, and turning my eyes in that direction I saw beyond the activity which I mentioned as engaged in some occupation of more ordinary nature. Being desirous of seeing what was going on, I proceeded in a direction which every man, woman and child in this vicinity have a deeper interest than in any other department matter. The foundation of this building are constructed of red stone, but the walls are of a light colored wood superstructure, and could not help speculating upon the effect of an earthquake of this material, upon the plan of the dimensions of the building, and upon these speculations suggested the following reflections of a curious and painful nature.

Education is supposed to improve the human understanding, and to better qualify the mind to perform their true duties, and yet, with two Colleges and any number of Public Schools, this community has not been able to perceive a truth in this connection as self-evident as those on which are founded the most successful business enterprises taught in the schools, that it is the policy of the people of Gettysburg to invest all their resources and to employ all their energies in the accumulation of money, and to accumulate it in the hands of a few persons, who, on assurance of suitable interest, would throw their surplus from all parts of the country. Gettysburg has been the scene of the most successful business enterprise for nearly fifty years past.

THE COLLEGE (located here) are interested with the balance of the community, in the speedy development of the Gettysburg enterprise. The people here are willing to subscribe to the stock of a company, or to a share of a suitable equity in any enterprise. The erection of a Hotel here which would make Gettysburg a place of resort for the elite of the health and pleasure seekers of the country, would be a great benefit to the community.
