THE CHEERFUL HEART.

BY MRS. TAYLOR. Some deem the world a dreary place, Devoid of all redeeming merits, But oh, it wears another face To cheerful and contented spirits! Why ever dim joy's brightest rays,

By gloomy fear of coming sorrows? I always cheat the cloudy days With hopeful thoughts of happier morrows

"Tis true that "all things he ht must fade;" That autmn's ster lesistless powers, With chilling wind and freezing shade, Will blast the leaves and blight the flowers; For the departed summor's prime Let other hearts be vainly yearning, But through the snows of winter time, I gladly watch for its returning.

'Tis true life's sorrows every day Seem almost to outweigh its pleasures, And death full often steals away The trusting heart's most cherished treasures. Let others mourn one dear one less, And wildly weep o'er heart-strings riven,

Another loving friend in heaven. 'Tis true, the friends are sadly few On whom we lean with trust uushaken, And oft o'er those we fancied true, Faith sighs to find herself mistaken. - I yield not to one vain regret, When wayward fate hath so bereft me,

I only joy that I possess

But only love more fondly yet

The dear ones still so kindly left me. Though hope may cease to sing awhile, And joy's sweet light seem slowly paling, 'Tis better far to wear a smile, For sighs and tears are unavailing. Let others weep that bright dreams fade,

And weekly wearing sorrow's fetter, Forever seek life's gloomiest shade-I love its cheering sunshine better I

What though my lot of pain and toil Be lowlier than my prouder brother's? What though I heap no golden spoil, The envy and the hate of others? Let others seek the shining road, And walk with mammon's worldly minions-

I joy that I've no wealth to load To earth my spirit's heavenward pinions!

Brightly may glisten glory's light, No envy in my bosom waking, For Fame's proud wreath, though fair to sight, Oft blooms above a heart that's breaking. The monarch's crown I covet not, And only pity those who wear it, Desiring with my humble lot Only a cheerful heart to bear it.
