

The Globe.

HUNTINGDON, PA.

The Neglected Spot.

Farmers generally give the want of time as a reason for inattention to their gardens. Accordingly, after the "lords of creation" have roughly plowed over the patch of ground dignified with the name of garden, they consign it, for the season, to the fowls of the household who, by some strange mismanagement of their labors, are supposed to have time enough and to spare. But it is really not so much for want of time as for want of taste, thought and habit, that farmers set so lightly by gardens—so lightly, sometimes, as not even to reward with a word or look of admiration the labor, taste and skill bestowed on them by their wives and daughters.

There is no equal space of ground on the entire farm that yields such an abundance and variety of useful products to the family as the garden, when properly cultivated. There is none that repays so well, in actual profits, the time, labor and skill expended upon it. It contributes materials for the convenience and comfort of living, through all the seasons of the year. In a merely economical point of view, therefore, the garden has strong claims to attention and care from every farmer, however many may be the broad acres of the farm that he cultivates. But it is not on this ground alone that the claim rests. Gardening in its higher efforts ranks with the fine arts. It is itself a cultivator. It prunes away the rough and shaggy manners of man, it trains the taste into all attractive and graceful forms, it cultivates thoughts fragrant with love and purity, it beautifies life itself, and sheds an odor of loveliness, sweeter than any odor, on all the family circle accustomed to enjoy together its delights.

We are not so romantic as to attribute such influences to the square enclosures that includes nothing but two rows of currant bushes, a cabbage plot, or six beds of onions, beets and parsnips, decked at the corners with bunches of sage and overhanging. These are good in their places. But a garden, such as any farmer in the land should have, must embrace more. It needs ornamental trees and shrubbery, to make it what it should be. Why should the farmer depend on the precarious supply of raspberries from the brambles in the fence corners, and go without strawberries altogether, when he has ground on which he might raise an ample supply for his table all the season through? And as to flowers, beyond the hollyhocks, which take care of themselves, behind the currant bushes out of reach of the plow share and the little bunch of pinks that Mary Jane has clandestinely placed by the side of the gate, many a farmer's garden has nothing that he can call by his general and only name, a posy.—The very names of many that ought to deck his garden and cultivate taste and infuse delight among his children, would be startling to him.

It is not so with all farmers. It is not so with as many as it once was.—There is improvement in progress.—And at this season, when nature is putting on her attractive beauty, this season of buds and promises, we take the occasion to present the claims of the garden. A beginning of improvement, where it has not been commenced, is all we ask for this year. Its reward will be sufficient argument to ensure perseverance. We admire well tilled fields, broad, green meadows, &c., as much as any farmer. And we would like to see the central spot of the farm, where the house is, where the young plants of immortality are growing, where character is forming, where affection and conversation have their daily flow, made the most beautiful of all, that it may be the most attractive now and draw to it the purest and pleasantest remembrances through life.

RAISE THE CALVES.—There can be but little doubt that cattle will bring a high price for a number of years to come. The high price of wool has caused farmers to stock their farms heavily with sheep, excepting in a few localities where dairying is the principal business. Immense quantities of cattle were consumed or destroyed by the armies on both sides during the war, and the remainder will put a stop to all importations. The high price of butter has consigned the calves to the butcher's cart at a very tender age that the number and size of the churning-milks be increased; consequently there is very little young stock in the country, as indicated by agricultural statistics carefully gathered from all parts. These facts would indicate that the true policy of the farmer is to raise the calves, eat less veal and more mutton, which is much the cheapest meat.

With good management more butter can be made from a given number of cows where the calves are raised, than where they are kept to a proper age and vealed. After a week or two they will thrive well on skimmed, and even sour milk with a porridge made of corn or oat meal.

TRANSPLANTING.—In transplanting anything that has roots large enough to admit of the practice, it is best to dip the roots, immediately before planting, into water. This will obviate the necessity of after watering and its consequent injurious effect. If the plants appear to flag, shade or put an inverted flower pot over the plant for a few days; if this does not bring the plant to, it must have water.

Tomatoes, egg plants, &c., when transplanted, should have the roots first set in a pan of muddy water. Perform the work just before sundown, and few will fail. If the following day is a very clear, hot and sunny one, then it is best to shade them during the heat. Shingles, stuck on the south and west side, answer well.

The peach worm may be prevented from doing much injury to the peach tree, by clearing away the dirt, say four inches deep at the crown of the root, and painting it six inches up on the body of the tree with gas or coal tar; but the work must be done before the leaf starts.
