"Any fool can do that," said neighbor Tucker, as I got the hole dug out to plant for the fifth time. "Just chuck your post into that ere hole, and pound the dirt in well, and it will stay till it rots. Dirt packs a great deal solider than stone," said Tucker, by way of a clincher.

ting a bar post as much as in setting a hen. I used to do it in your way un-til I found out a better. You see if you pack the dirt in solid there is no chance for the water to run off quick and the soundest wood will rot off just below the surface of the ground in a very short time. I have had them spoiled in three years so that I had to put in another. That bar post has been in service at least thirty-five years, and, if you examine the wood you will see it is about as sound where t has been under ground as it is above. "I dig a good sized hole to begin with, and then put in a good sound post of chestnut or white oak, stripped of the bark. The butt should be at least eighteen inches below the lower hole in order to hold well. I pack in around the post stones of any convenient size, and pound them in snug with a crowbar. This leaves room for air to circulate all around the bottom part of the post, and it is kept about as if it were above ground. A post set in this way is good for an ordinary lifetime. I have some posts of forty years' standing, and they are good yet. The frost of course will move the stones, and they will need resetting occasionally, but no sooner than those packed in dirt."

"How much do you suppose you have made by that operation?" asked

> The Gapes in Chickens. Permit me to state that should I find a case of gapes in my yard, the chicken would be at once transferred to the manure heap or buried near the grape vines. Do not torture a chicken afflicted with this malady by inserdoubtful remedy; but rather kill the sufferer at once, and dispose of it as above. Better than all to avoid the gapes entirely. I have not had a sinhominy for newly-hatched chicks.
