Withering, blighting, cruel Death; Borne on the wings of a pitiless heath, Like the sweep of a Typhoon gust; Ruthlessly old and young alike, He bears slong in one vast dyke,

Featful and dark are the myriad aides

Through which he crowds the souls:

Lurid and ghastly the narrow defiles,

But 'tis only here, the vision of sin,

With its cruel suffering and horrid din,
Can rack the mortal with wee;

'Tis only on earth, his minions are free

Our idols are laid 'neath the turf every day, And still the great grief knews ne decay, Nor do we feel less forsuken;

We look into Death's dark, blank night,

With faces pitiful, cold and white,
And wonder why, they are taken?

To ue, its mysteries nover are shown, Nor the barques of human freight.

By an unseen pilot ferried o'er Into the silent land; We ken not on this earth-side,

When they reach the hidden strand.

Down through Plutonia's realm?

Do they full 'mid dark and dreamless space,

Do they find the diamond, the crown and the Do they walk with those in that blest abode, Who blaze in splendor supernal?
