HUNTING DON, PA.

LOST LITTLE ONES.—Looking at each | WOW other across the river, across the valley, are the white stones that mark the sleeping places of our dead. The little brown mounds grow more fretendrils around our necks, and tumb-ling sweet, broken syllables in our cars, are, with one gust of snow swept away and hidden in the ground. These are the empty chair, the silent playthings, the little dress, limp for the want of the little form, and the crumpled shoes that will be dented no more with pattering feet; all wreathed with sad remembrances of the happy hours when the closed eyes danced with delighted wonder at each fresh sight of the new creation. Love for the little ones is all the world round the same. The sparrow croons just astenderly over her "brownies" as the oriole over hers, clothed in velvet and gold. Hearts are inside of us all, and no costly weaving makes love the less or the more. Brown hands can build enstles in the air as deftly as can't Be Beaten white fingers, and all wring with equal sorrow at the wreck.

But think how full of pleasantness the little lives have been; the unfinished ring of their tiny years have been plaited all around with love and blossoms, the scent of the lilacs and lillies. The memory of caressings that in after years we forget, these dear ones carry with them to heaven. Banished from one paradise to another-from this, where shadows sometimes drive away smiles, to where there are no shadows Sad it is to die young. Is it not sad der to die old? How many there are that have babies that never grow up, that live life-long in the memory as the little ones that never wandered till we laid them quietly down beneath that green coverlid that needeth smoothing and softening no more.

Upon that mysterious, unknown sea that rolls all around the world, how many little souls daily drift out! Mothers in every land are crying on the shore, of their great loss, in auguish and tears. But yonder invisible hands welcome the little earth-orphans, and celestial voices shout in glad delight that another angel is born in heaven!
