The Soldiers' Orphan school of Cassville, numbering about one hundred and seventy, favored us with their presence on the fourth, and gave us an interesting concert. The children performed their parts well, considering the disadvantages which they had to contend with. There not being sufficient seats to seat more that one fourth of the audience; the falling of the platform, which was caused by rushing too many upon it, owing the excessive heat of the day, altogether would have a tendency to divert the attention of the children. The whole affair however, throughout the festivities of the day may be said to be a grand success, as the great numbers that were present appeared to be highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were highly entertained, and better than all, the children of the orphan school were
