Whether the mode and form of reconstruction are the best that might have been devised, is less a question for consideration than whether what has been done shall be maintained or reversed. We have got beyond the stage at which criticism of the details of measures, or even their principles, might have been advantageously disenssed. The method is now obscured by the result. A process in its nature rough has at least advanced us far toward the complete restoration of the South to the Union. Several of the States are once more represented in Congress, and others will be before the adjournment. Nearly the whole South is within sight of the goal which marks the cessation of military rule, and the re-establishment of local self

The question at issue is, whother what has been done shall continue in Huntingdon, April 16, 1808. operation, with a certainty that it will gradually render pacification complete, or whether it shall be violently overthrown, rights that have been conferred taken away, guarantees that have been provided, destroyed, and the confusion and peril incident to a vital struggle renewed. It is a question, on one hand, of peace, with ample opportunities of adapting the new governments to local circumstances andwants and, on the other, of strife and bloodshed, with race arrayed against race, and the old spirit of the rebellion in direct hostility to the national authority. By upholding what Congress has done, and perfecting the application of the principles it has affirmed, and the measures it has developed, we have the assurance that a brief period will obliterate remaining causes of difficulty, and lay the foundation of an era of vast industrial progress and prosperity. By breaking down, or by attempting to break down, the work of reconstruction, a struggle would be provoked hardly less terrible than that which tho loyal strength of the Republic put down. There can be no disturbance of reconstruction, no invasion of the rights it has created or the principles of government it has developed, without a contest leading to anarchy.

Shall the Rebel element be reinvested with power to mould and control the South according to its pleasure? Or shall the loyal forces to which the national Government has given shape and direction be watched, and if necessary aided, until their endurance be placed beyond doubt? These alternatives make up the issue which the people of the country must decide. It is a choice between order and revolution-between governments born of law and anarchy resulting from brute force; and the election of Grant or Seymour will indicate the national

Equally clear is the line drawn be-tween the parties on the subject of finance. Business interests suffer seriously from the absence of a sound and steady financial system; and this again, requires as an essontial condition, intelligent and well-established confidence. A wise and just management of the debt is the first step on the road to confidence; and the relative claims of the Republican and Democratic parties rest upon their re- Can't Be Beaten! spective purposes and principles.

The Republican policy is to abate the burden of the debt by so steadfastly promoting the public credit that the substitution of a lower for a higher rate of interest shall be rendered fea- GROCERIES, CONFECTIONERIES,

The Democratic policy is to lighten the load by paying the debt in a depreciated currency instead of gold. It is a question, therefore, of good faith or repudiation—of national bonor national disgrace-of a confidence that will be felt in every department of trade, or a distrust that will paraiyze industry and ongulf trade in

Whether true or not that from the moment he was sworn into the White House Mr. Johnson became a candidate for another term on the Democratic tack, it is certain than he has done more to keep the party in the field and to supply it with arms, ammunition, rations, and clothing that any ten or ten thousand men who were stranded with McClellan and Pendleton on the Chicago peace platform.— Since the beginning of his conflict with Congress in December, 1865, Mr. Johnson's policy, it is charged, has been directed to three results—first, the reconstruction and restoration of the Rebel States on the Johnson platform;
