THE GREAT NATURAL WONDER. COLORADO CANON - INTERESTING STORY. We find in the last number of the Western Monthly, a very charming story entitled "Lost and Found in the Rocky Mountains," which throws considerable light upon the wonderful Colorado canon. The story is by J. E. Hodo, formerly associate editor of the Springfield Republican, and while "Karl" is a fiction, the essential facts are to be relied upon. The traditions of the Pueblos tell of an immense population of their ancestors inhabiting the basin of the Colorado and its tributaries, in a most happy past, when the country was well watered and like a garden, and gold was mined in every home. From this region the Montezumas are supposed to have received those abundant treasures that tempted the cupidity of the Spaniards to conquest, and the extermination of a helpless race. Karl took as many of the golden images and curious implements as he could conveniently carry upon his person, and in his wanderings, provisions, and started again upon his journey. Every day the river grew wider and deeper, and it soon occurred to Karl that he might take advantage of its current and economize his own strength. He accordingly devoted a day to the construction of a raft, from a few dry logs of trees as he could collect and bind together with strips of hide from his wallet. The structure was not very firm, but he trusted himself to its frail support, and for two or three days the voyage was most delightful. The country through which he passed was striking in its scenery. At some points high cliffs rose close to one side of the stream, while on the other side there were glimpses of clusters of flowers and gay with brilliant and musical birds, spread out to the foot of some neighboring mountain. Several times he had glimpses of clusters of flowers like those he had visited. Occasionally the river would contract suddenly between precipitous banks and sweep his way between them with impetuosity. At length, just after sunset one afternoon, he felt his speed rapidly accelerating, and before he could make an attempt to touch the shore he was plunged and whirling down rapids into a deep chasm. He clung firmly to the raft and was soon comparatively calm water; but the current was still very swift. The canon grew narrower again, and its black walls towered a tremendous height over his head. The rapids grew more rapid and to drift on with the current, into the darkness and to probable death. Through the long night he clung with the energy he despair to the raft, not daring to sleep, and so passed several days and nights rushing gorges; and the morning brought no relief. The river indeed grew wider, but the current was still very swift, and its rocky banks barred all outlet of escape. To complete his wretchedness, a cascade from a tall cliff drenched him with icy water and washed his raft overboard into a deep stream. The remainder of his voyage, Karl could give but a vague account. He recalls that the making of the raft, on which he had been drifting, made a narrow channel with a much larger stream, which flowed through a still deeper and more tremendous canon for many miles. He also tells of banks of golden sand, and of bright yellow gold, with some flakes of silver, and dust of the same. There have been several abortive attempts to ascend the river through this canon, and one man has since passed down through it, if we may believe his account, which is reported and accredited by Dr. C. C. Parry, the geologist of a survey for a Pacific railroad on the thirty-sixth parallel. In White, now living at Carlisle, in the man who professes to have made the voyage down the river to this point. White states that he embarked upon a raft on Grand river, an upper tributary of the Colorado, with one companion, Henry Strolo, in order to escape a party of Indians who had killed one of his comrades and stolen their supplies. Strolo was washed off the raft in a rapid and drowned, but White adhered to his raft, and reached Carlisle in fourteen days, nearly starved and his reason nearly gone. He estimates the average height of the walls of the canon at three thousand feet, and its length at five or six hundred miles, with no available opening in its solid walls, as he thinks. But he must have been most of the time, in the latter part of the voyage, on foot or too insecure to notice accurately, and it is likely that there will be found breaks in the canon, and possible valleys at intervals along the river. This stupendous natural canal, though solid rock has no known parallel, and it should be fully explored by Government engineers for additions to the geographical and scientific knowledge of our own country, as well as for the advantage of the pioneers of industry and civilization, who are pressing up on all sides. The United States possesses an area of over two billion acres, which, if populated as densely as Massachusetts, would accommodate in the neighborhood of six hundred million people. We know a girl so industrious, that when she has nothing else to do, she sits and knits her brow—the doer.
