A NIGHT IN A STORM. It was a private parlor of a hotel in the Province. Two men sat at a well spread breakfast table; the younger had just pushed back the table with a wistful expression.

"No," he said abruptly, "I cannot eat, I cannot drink. If I believed in presentiments I should say I felt a warning of something disagreeable and not horrible."

"Well, then, my dear nephew," said the elder, "as you do not believe in such things, why not make yourself comfortable and enjoy your breakfast. You are not to start until to-morrow, anyway, you know."

"The young man arose from his seat and walked to the window, throwing it open and looking out into the frosty brilliant sunshine. The air was intensely cold, and reddened his cheeks instantly. He drew in his breath, saying, 'I shall start this morning. There's going to be a storm, and I must go. Will you accompany me to the station? The train starts in an hour.'"

"No," he said, "I will not leave the house unless I'm obliged to. I did not leave home to be frozen by a Canadian winter. I did not know you were so sentimentally foolish. Alce would not thank you for coming a day sooner. Women are like a bridge-gang around when the water is so shallow that they are going on, no matter how much in love they are. Take my advice, and stay here until the time appoints for your departure."

Robert Russell, the young man addressed, listened with grave attention to his companion's words.

What was such advice in comparison with the urgent cries of his whole nature? He had left England three weeks before, to claim the woman of his choice, who had been a year in Montreal when she had emigrated with her parents, carrying with her the love and promise of one in whom she believed with utter devotion.

man as he came upon a corner overturned in the snow. He was close to it before he could make out what it was. There were no horses attached—that he saw in a glance—but the things cut short off, were fastened there with iron bolts, and he saw that the side of the sleigh, while the other side was deeply imbedded. He leaped upon the runner, and hurriedly pulled the shafts as he had never known before. At last, it seemed to him so long though it was hardly a moment—in that snowy moonshine he saw the pallid face of a woman lying motionless among her furs.

With a suppressed cry he lifted that beautiful form to his shoulder, and sat down on the cutter, holding his lips to the cold ones that could not respond to his caress. And yet she was not dead—a faint breath just sighed across his cheek.

Was it he had thought to greet his promised wife? He could not think—he knew nothing but that he had found Alice—and his whole being rose to the rescue that he would save her—that neither snow nor ice nor cold should take her from him. She was his and he claimed her despite everything.

But he could not linger there; he must be moving on, though ever so slowly. He bore his burden to his own door, and when he had laid her down he could not save her after that fearful paroxysm was going on, no matter how much in love they are. Take my advice, and stay here until the time appoints for your departure."
