An analysis prepared for the Pennsylvania Railroad by the pressure behind, they are pushed up seeking constantly lower levels. When forced by the pressure behind, they are pushed up through any appertures they meet, or that are open for them, and flow out as springs, or aresians wells.

To sink a well of this kind therefore with a reasonable prospect of bringing up a supply of water it is essential that the spot selected should be a lower level than other lands in the vicinity, though these lands may be sev miles away. The strata of rock also should be inclined toward the lower level. It is sometimes the case that the head of wat er is at so high an elevation that the column of water bursts forth through such a boring

Much more might with profit be copied fro the same article but our object is to invite examination into the subject and inquire whether we are not in precisely the geological formation in which successful Artesian wells

The water which falls upon Warrior Ridge and which every one who seeks for it there, by means of deep wells, fails to find, all lies in the crevices of sand rock immediately underneath us, confined there between impervious limestone strata above and beneath, and only awaiting a means of escape to rise to perhaps half the height of the Ridge itself.
