A correspondent of the Live Stock Jour nal gives the following preventive of the ravages of these insects in cornfields. Soak the seed in copperas water twenty-four hours before planting. Keep the water a little warm, say 78° Fah. One pound of copperas in three gallons of water to one bushel of seed. He tested it last year, and not a hill was touched. The copperas turns the seed black, but does not injure the germinative properties. Another preventive is the following:

Soak your seed one night in a tub of equal proportions of lye made from ashes and common urine, with a fair portion of blue stone dissolved therein. Pour off the liquid through a basket into a tub, to preserve for use again. Then while the corn is wet, take a first class article of plaster, and mix and stir till each and every grain is thickly and thoroughly coated with plaster, so as to cover the entire surface of grains. Then plant as usual, being careful not to break or rub off the coating. It is said to be, by those who have tested it, a complete preventive against those annoyers to all farmers .-Ohio Farmer

It would seem that the general advanage of thorough cultivation ought to be sufficient inducement to incite the tiller of the soil to vigorous efforts for the suppression of weeds. It is manifest to the commonest observer that, if we expect remuerating crops, we must not leave them to contend with hosts of rival enemies in the soil, and yet this is often the case, to a wide extent, throughout the country. Not only are noxious weeds allowed to grow among the crops, but often after the crops are removed, whole fields are abandoned to weeds of almost every description, as also are road-sides. These are fruitful nurseries, and their flowering season is thus protracted until late in autumn, filling the atmosphere with the impalpable dust of their pollen, irritating and inflaming the delicate organs of the human system is new soil and season of the delicate organs of the human system is new soil and season for the suppression of the simple paled to try it.
