The winter, says the "American Farmer," is the time to prepare the compost heap, to gather together all the materials and incorporate them so that in spring they will be in condition for the crops to digest easily. It is a work which is easy of accomplishment if it is steadily pursued but unfortunately it receives but little at tention from the majority of southern planters. There are very few places where the materials for a large and valuable compost heap cannot be collected during the winter months, if he would only take the necessary trouble. The fallen leaves from the woods, all refuse vegetable matter, creek mud, and a little lime, will make a most excellent compost with stable manure cotton seed, and all other matter which will produce fermentation and decomposition. It is astonishing what a large pile of fertilizing matter can be collected in a short time if attention is given to it every day. Wherever river mud or muck can be obtained without too much hauling nothing is better than mixed with slacked lime in proportion of a bushel of the latter to a half cord of the former. The heap should be worked over well, so as to pulverize and mix the ingredients thoroughly, and when warm weather commences decomposition will take place immediately .--We should begin now to gather the leaves and trash, and muck, sprinkling the heap as it grows with lime, as already indicated. Leave one quarter of its bulk of stable manure, cotton seed and other vegetable matters as can be collected; it will be one of the richest possible fertilizers. Ashes can be added to such a pile with great advantage, and the refuse from the kitchen and outhouse, if thrown in to swell the ble because we cannot afford to buy the expensive artificial manures of commerce, and give this as an excuse why we make poor crops, when we allow hundreds of cords of natural manure of the best quality to lie ungathered and unused all around us. One hand and one ox-team put to work now will build up an immense bank of fertility before seed time, which will in harvest add many a bale of cotton and barrel of corn to the crop. But now is the time to begin. Let no consideration arrest the work. Gather up the leaves, clean out the fence corners, pile up the corn stalks, haul away the muck from the borders of the branch, burn up the old logs and brush now cumbering the ground, and collect the ashes; mix them all together with a few bushels of slacked lime, ma king the pile broad and flat, on the top, and early in the spring add the stable manure and other fermenting matter. The labor expended will cost very little The lime can be bought for a few dollars. The result will be a permanent enriching of the land and largely increased crops.

Death of Vines, Bushes, Etc.

A correspondent of the American Artisan says: The writer has several hundred raspberry bushes of a choice variety. They generally withstand the winter, but occasionally, after a very cold season, or when the ground has been less protected by snow than usual, they fail to put forth in the spring, so that it is the safest to cover them in the fall. Last fall they were neglected, and last spring they failed to come ...t. An old gardener who examined them said, "the sap has been all frozen ... it of them," and this freezing out of the s o he considered as in all cases the cause the death of vines and shrubs after unusually cold winters. The gardener's exprimation was hardly satisfactory, and the question, "How came the bushes to die?" became the subject of reflection. A theory saggested itself. The spring was uncommonly tardy, the ground for these reasons remaining cold, and the roots remaining torpid much later than usual. Might not, under these conditions, the stalks and has just opened up a large and varied assortment bads, exposed to the sun and winds of BOOTS, spring so long before they could get sap from the torpid root, become so dried out and the sap vessels so contracted that the sap could not find its way up? If this theory were correct, might not the cause be reby moved artificially moistening the stalk in some way? Acting upon this as a plau sible or at least possible hypothesis, three bushes were bent down to the ground and covered with moist earth. At the expiracovered with moist earth.
