If your friends are encouraged they will work on. But should you not show as much interest in your own welfare as your friends do, by attending the next meeting, they will consider their effort as so much valuable time thrown away upon an unappreciative public—and that, no doubt, will be the last meeting. Your friends have proposed means by which permanent benefits may be obtained, but they do not ask you to adopt any of them absolutely; they have placed them before you help, you will lie, and your carts will stick in the mud until the chains of the white slave be broken by the sanguinary struggles of war. Come, then, workingmen, to the next meeting, and hear what you may hear and say what you have to say. Don't have it said that the workingmen of this town would not strike a blow, even for themselves.
