FLEECING THE FARMERS .- The unsuspecting are constantly being made the subjects of deception at the hands of the shrewd and unprincipled, and to put our readers on their guard we give one of the "dark ways" that are resorted to in order to "fleece" the unwary out of their cash, as we find it described in the Lancaster Express of Friday.

scribed in the Lancaster A general agent for the sale of what purports to be a farm implement, called Hay and Harvest Grinders, appears unto a farmer and after some conversation, induces him to accept the agency for the same, and in consideration thereof a note is signed by the farmer whom we will call Mr. Brown, as is shown on the margin.

Where the space appears as is shown in the ote, the General Agent, Mr. Smith, after quitting Mr. Brown, tears off and destroys that portion to the right hand side, thus "Endorsed, Smith, without recourse."

The trick is evident to all when thus explained, and a case is now pending the action of the Supreme Court, in which Brown proposes to show The man who don't see the Centennial that the paper in suit is but a part of an agreement will be a curiosity, and from present indications entered into between himself and Smith, proposwe are inclined to think that we will be that chap. ing to constitute the defendant an agent to sell a large flock of sparrows at his residence, and the State, and that the paper making him such agent birds are as regular as clock work in calling for has, since it was signed by him, been cut in two pieces, without his knowledge or consent, so as to make the part in evidence. read as a promisor; note for $250, and that a large part of the original nstrument was cut off and that the paper in suit is not the whole of the paper signed by the defendant, nor in the shape in which he signed it.

NEEF'S MILLS, Oct. 15th. If this be madness, there is method in it.—Pol.nius.

Mr Editor:—I zend you this communication, but don't urge its publication, at least not piecemeal as you gave the last. You perhaps consider yourself a very competent judge of what articles will make your paper pay. Allow me, however, to say that I consider myself a still better judge of what the people—not desire, but ought to have in order to make knowledge and the noble art of John Guttenberg a blessing, not a curse, to pander to human passions. You see, I take the whole responsibility on my own shoulders. It is indeed very interesting for the public to know that Polly's ulcer has burst and so forth! Give to the dogs poetry, that deals in heavy, dreamy, indigestible sublimity! What is the language of the Gods for us mortals, or what is "eaviar (?) for the plebs."!!!

Still, Mr. Editor, it's a real, genuine, only awrully life-like dream, which I have to offer this time to the public, or not to offer, as you will see time to the public, or not to offer, as you will see

By the way, as I am thinking about it, do you know where the phrase: "All goes merry and the goose hangs high," originates? The Belleton the Watchman of either last year or the year before the last, has it thus: It is not "hangs high," but Anglo-Saxon "bonks high," signifying the peculiar call of the "wild goose." How that reminds me of the days of my boyhood, when my eyes were riveted into the blue of heaven, following the long flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight, that tells of distant clines, when the goose flight that the goose flight
