Farm and Household

Turkey Breeding.

A flock of well grown turkeys make such an agreeable addition to the receipts of the farm, and are often raised with so little trouble, that I wonder at the sceming indifference of so many farmers with reference to them. The rules for breeding are simple and easy understood, and failures are due to two prominent causesone, the weather, which, in some seasons, puts at fault the utmost possible care; the other negligence.

A hot and dry season is well nigh an essential for success with turkeys. This is so important that it is of little use to be in MORE THAN ONE MILLION COPIES SOLD. haste to get turkeys hatched early, as we Gold Medal Awarded to the Author by the may do with chickens; though old birds are tough enough, young ones exceedingly tender. If brought out by the first of June, it will, in most cases, be early enough. Even if they live through such chilly and damp weather as is common in May, they will not grow much until hot weather and bugs come to their relief but let them hatch out in June, in weather which drives the breeder to the shade, and little turkeys just enjoy it; they will with every token of delight. Damp, chilly weather is their ruin ; rain abomination ; morning dew a poison sure to blight the hopes of unexperienced or careless breeders. PRESCRIPTIONS for the above named and other Turkeys must be allowed to range very freely to insure success, but not while the grass is wet-that is, during the first two mouths or so of their lives. After that one need not be quite so particular. Early turkeys not being advisable, the first litter of eggs from a hen may be reserved for a common hen in May, and the turkey hen be invited to lay a second litter, which she will do if broken up. N. B. The author can be consulted on the above named diseases swell as all diseases requiring skill, secrecy the Enquirer, before a mixture could be found that would stand the test of rain and frost. At last the following has given thorough satisfaction. Venetian red and Paris brown, in proportion to suit the taste, are mixed with a quantity of water to make a heavy wash. With this the walls are well coated. To settle the color to the wall and prevent its washing off by the rain, a wash with diluted muriatic acid (one-quarter acid) is given over the painted surface.

The mixture forming the white lines or | ried off by their use joints is made of settled white lime, to which is slowly added plaster of Paris, kept stirring until the mixture is past setting; then mix a little fine sand, to keep from cracking, and work into the consistence of glazier's putty. This putty is then applied to the walls by two men, along a straight edge, and with a beading trowel, the distance of the joints having been previously measured. Care should be taken, in applying this putty, to press it strongly against the wall, to prevent any water creeping between it and the brick. In winter time we should suppose that the water would freeze, expand, and detach the white joint, thus spoiling the looks of the building. But it is important if the treatment above described proves effectual. It is certainly worth trying, for an indestructible red and white paint on brickwork is very beautiful.
