the President's visit to the South and the pledges he is exacting, hits the nail on the head exactly when it says:

"At Louisville the other day he asked the crowd which welcomed him if they were ready to support the Constitution as it is, and they answered with a yell that they were. Why must this question be so often repeated? We are tired of asking the South whether she is willing to support the Constitution or obey the law. We do not hear such questions put in the North. For forty years there has always been a nervous anxiety whether or not the South would agree to obey the laws of Congress, and now we have the President journeying in that section, and wherever he stops he invariably asks, "Gentlemen, are you ready to take the Constitution as your guide and obey the law?" He did not ask such questions in Ohio. In all his speeches north of Mason and Dixon's line, President Hayes never once referred to the obedience of the people to the law, and did not ask whether there was a man within his hearing who hesistated to accept the Constitution or obey the law. He would have been resented. It is not a question in the sections referred to whether the organic or statute law is to be obeyed. Laws here are of majestic force, of power at once recognized and respected, and no man presumes to debate the policy of their obedience. But in the South we eternally hear this inquiry, Will you obey TROY, KANSAS, Sept., 17, 1877.
