State Interests.

Governor's Message--Concluded. insurrection or rebellion, and car result only in the final vindication of the law, in anarchy or the subversion of the government.

THE MILITIA. The primary function of the State is to preserve the peace and guarantee, under the laws, the rights of persons and property. Your at tention has already been called to the necessity of increasing and defining the powers of sheriffs, and you will also consider the means of improving the instrument confided to the Executive. It has been the constant policy of the resent administration to use the military of the resent administration to use the resen Executive. It has been the constant policy of the present administration to use the military power of the State only in the last resort. Unfortunately the weakness of the local civil machinery has made that necessity, of late years, frequent. Five times within seven years the militia has been called into one or another part of the State, and on all former occasions, its presence alone has been sufficient to restore order. During the late troubles it also, in the end, succeeded in removing the embargo upon the traffic of the State and protecting its citithe traffic of the State and protecting its citizens in the right to work, but, during its shor campaign, certain deficiences and faults in the system were made apparent.

There are three inherent defects in a militia system, which, although they may be reduced to a minimum, must always exist. In the first place, devoted chiefly to civil pursuits, a citizen soldiery must always be more or less affected by the sympathies of the community in which they live. No laws or codes can prevent the common soldiers from imbibing the principles and prejudices of the men they constantly associate with in their daily walks In the second place, with comparatively little time and opportunity for battalion and regi-mental drill, they cannot be expected to have the steadiness of trained professional soldiers Finally, in a volunteer organization, without pay, the inclinations of the men must always be considered in the selection of officers; there is never the same relative difference between them as in a regular army, and, on that ac count, there can never be the same absolute count, there can never be the same absolute authority over the rank and file. The only alternative which will entirely obviate these defects is a regular standing army, disassociated from the people and trained to arms alone. Even if it were not unconstitutional such a force would be unnecessary for the State, and we must, therefore, exert ourselves to bring our present militia system to the greatest possible efficiency.

I have been thus solicitous to present the conditions of a militia campaign, because the

Thave been thus solicitous to present the conditions of a millitia campaign, because the conditions of a millitia campaign, because the condent of our troop during the late crisis has elicited every variety of criticism, from mild censure to absolute condemnation, and because there has grown up in Pennsylvania a spirit of caviling at its militia, in marked contrast with the kindly feelings and pride manifested by other States toward their citizen soldiery. Now, that a temperate review of the facts may be made, 4 believe it will not be considered a partial judgment to say, that the conduct of the State troops during the late strike was, upon the whole, commendable and creditable. In Pittsburgh, before a final decision, many considerations must modify our judgment.—The conditions were not purely military. It was not simply a question of preserving a body of soldiery intact, of holding a position or defeating an enemy. Expecting to march into a friendly community, whose moral support would be cheerfully given them, they entered a practically hostile city, were denounced and threatened by press and people, and attacked by men who lurked in the security of a sympathetic crowd, and used women and children as shields and instruments. If, under such circumstances, their action lacked the energy and severity that purely military canons would have justified, it cannot be a matter of surprise, that having so long been accustomed to peace; they were unable to comprehend at once the sudden conditions of war. As it was, though not executed with the skilled precision of regular troops, the movement accomplished its purpose, and the failure to move the freight late purpose, and the failure to move the freight late purpose, and the failure to move the freight late purpose, and the failure to move the freight late purpose, and the failure to move the freight late purpose, and the failure to move the freight late purpose, and the failure to move the freight. conditions of a militia campaign, because the conduct of our troop during the late crisis has though not executed with the skilled precision of regular troops, the movement accomplished of regular troops, the movement accomplished its purpose, and the failure to move the freight trains out of the city, to which more than any fact the subsequent burning is attributable, was the result of the want of co-operation of an adequate and competent police, and the desertion, at the critical moment, of the railroad employes. The behavior of the Pittsburgh troops, in a military sense, is without excuse; but was it any worse than the defection of officers and men in the regular army, who, in 1861, deserted their comrades in arms who, in 1861, deserted their comrades in arms to join the communities in which they were born and bred? Such things are not military, they are political or social; and it cannot be expected that they should be judged by the severest military code. It was in fact the temporary excitement of unthinking men, carried away by the universal clamor around them. For that reason, when the burst of passion was over, I reinstated them; otherwise new troops would have had to be enlisted, while these might be trusted to have a keener sense of duty, from a desire to retrieve their fame. In the case of the Philadelphia troops, although disheartened by being placed on the defensive, and a part of the command demoralized by a too precipitate retreat, the general steadiness and obedience to orders under comparative hardships and in real danger, show them to have been composed of the best of soldiery material. The failure to subdue a city in insurrection against the laws is not to be attributed to the want of courage, carpedity or fidelity in the erginers and men't. who, in 1861, deserted their comrades in arms appendix, herewith transmitted. is not to be attributed to the want of courage,

Recognizing the exact conditions of the operation in making some desirable changes in the law, to better prepare the troops for active duty. The standing menace, in any fulure disturbance, that the railroads may be useless for transportation, either by the absolute refusal of the engineers and crews to man them, or from tracks being torn up or bridges burned, makes it necessary to fully equip the militia for long marches and the field. Except in one or two instances, the troops, although in receipt of the regular yearly allowance of money, were found provided only with uniforms and arms—all the equipments for active, continuous and independent service, blankets, overcoats, haversacks, canteens, &c., being in part or wholly wanting. A modification of the law is required to devote the fund to purely military purposes. The Executive has power military purposes. The Executive has power by law to reorganize and reduce the National Guard, in accordance with the recommendation of the Adjutant General, but the action of the Legislature will be necessary to respect to the properties of the properties of the sale of the sale of the properties of the properties of the properties of the properties of the present act fixing the fees of county officers, passed in act fixing the fees of county of county of the act fixing the fees of county of county of the act fixing the fees of county of county of the act fixing the fees of county of county of the act fixing the fees of county of county of the act fixing the fees of county of county of the act fixing the fees of county of county of the act fixing the fees of county of county of county of the act fixing the fees of county of county of county of

WESTERN PENITENTIARY.

Last year the Legislature passed an appropriation to relieve the over-crowded condition of the Eastern Penitentiary. This year it will be necessary to do the same for the Western Penitentiary which institution has now eight hundred and thirty prisoners, with capacity for only four hundred, or at the most, five hundred. Two, three and four convicts are necessarily confined in a cell, and, during the hot rummer months, the crowded condition of the prison will certainly engender disease and death. The matter will require your immediate attention, and it may be necessary to take prompt action upon some plan for increasing the accommodations for the convicts of the prisoners appointed to accommodations for the convicts of the prison will certainly engender disease and death. The fact that as many answered the call for a service likely to be long and dangerous, as assembled in the pleasant encampment at the Centennial, is conclusive proof of the zeal and fidelity of the troops.

I expect to the widows and families of those of the militia who fell in the service of the State. The public welfare demanded the service in which these men lost their lives, and justice requires that the State, which profited by the sacrifice, should contribute to the support of their natural protectors. I trust that, upon the broad principles of common justice, this natural protectors.
