THE PIONEERS OF LOCAL METHODISM in Philadelphia have long since been retired to their well earned rest in the mansions of their God, but their descendants are yet with us, many of them occupying honored places not only in the Church, but in other relations of life; and it may hence be worth while to recall the names of a few of those who first braved the sneer and reproach of such persons as affected to despise the adherents of Wesley. The old Saint George's church, to which we referred somewhat briefly in our last paper, after being sold by order of the Provincial Assembly, and purchased by young Hockley (probably Heockly), was conveyed to Miles Pennington, a tallow chandler, who for these orphan little ones have no one was a member of the infant society; and Mr. Asbury, when referring to the church So Honora Leigh went back to her life for some years after its purchase and positions of patient drudgery and ceaseless toil once session, mentioned it as "our preaching session, mentioned it as "our preach house," so it would seem the name Saint George's, by which it is now known, was not given to it until about the year 1781, after which time he determined it in his writings. Doctor Lednum, referring to the first improvement of the building by which it was made ready as a place of worship, said, "It was floored from end to end, and more comely seats were put in it, with a new pulpit like a tall tub on a post, which was the fashion of the times, but one of the worst fashions that ever was for a pulpit." floor became acquainted with the daily governess—how the children began to run in and out of his room, and ask him to tell when, from the leaky stove pipe, mended when, from the leaky stove pipe, mended them marvelous stories of America, whence with clay, the smoke would frequently is he came-and how at last pretty Honora sue and fill all the house," and describing went back to America with him as his the pulpit he says: "About twenty feet wife, would make too long a recital in de from the east end there stood a square tail.
