

most poles, far beyond the reach of smoking chimneys or the pit of wandering stones. As the hour of noon approaches, this calmness gradually gives place to an air of excitement; a chance strolling wagon is seen crawling along the street; anon, a dashing horse gallops along, bearing on his back, perhaps, one of the marshals of the day, big with excitement; while crowds of well-dressed young men keep passing up and down street, or may be standing at the tavern doors, or the corners of the street; all appears to be bustle and hurry. At three o'clock—but here my pen flags! Let it suffice that the town is now nearly deserted; the small boys and the large boys—the young misses—the lover and his mistress—the modest young men and the older men, are all gone; scarce one remains except the confirmed misanthrope who lies stretched in the shade, rendering the surrounding gloom more visible. All have gone to the "Head of the Spring," and thither let us repair also. This delightful spot, although scarcely beyond the precincts of town, is buried in romantic seclusion; the road lies partly through a little stretch of woodland, and slightly beyond this a hill sweeps abruptly to a considerable height, at the foot of which from among the rocks gushes forth a cool transparent stream: a clump of noble oak and walnut trees overshadow this retired spot, dedicated to the cause of liberty, and the more private matter of the heart. Here many a sentimental flirtation has ended in matrimony, and many an embryo Demosthenes has kept us in admiration, while he held up Greece and Rome as a beacon to guide us in the pathway of duty; and here at this present anniversary, seated on those long circular benches, are the elite of our village and surrounding neighborhood, each one contributing to the general joy. The evening is spent in innocent amusements, and in partaking of refreshments; small parties form and promenade the lawn; others make more extensive walks; while to many the most pleasant walk is to the summit of the hill, to steal a look down through the tree tops upon the lively groups below; this hill embraces a view of the whole ground, and during the evening is visited by almost all the company. The party generally closes by some old-fashioned play in which all participate, such as "Blindman's Buff" or "Prisoner's Bast," or something of this kind; and, however the more squeamish may be disposed to kick at these games elsewhere, here with a good grace they must submit, for it has always been customary, and no change is desired; it affords the greatest pleasure to the greatest number—and what need of reform? Something or other frequently occurs which is unexpected and goes off therefore with a better relish; for instance, some of the more reckless part of the village youth take the company by surprise by appearing in masquerade; which throws all into charming confusion; children cry, and timid young ladies seek protection in the arms of their lovers; in fact their appearance is enough to strike terror among the bold. Such grotesque shapes and dresses, and good Heaven's what horns! that must once have graced some patriarchal ram, and such horrid noses turning upwards in defiance; Macbeth's witches and Milton's lost spirits are here personified—and such music! a gang were more tolerable; a garran of a horse, long, lang, and gray, on which one of this saintly crew is mounted, completes the picture. They march once or twice around the company, take some refreshment, perhaps mount the rostrum, or form a circle on the green, and take an Indian war dance; when this is over they depart in the same order in which they came, and marching along the bank of the stream are soon lost to view in the neighboring woods.

with admiration sit on the fence looking anxiously on the passing scenes within, pleased with scenes in which they cannot participate; well may they admire, for Monkey Sam is himself a note of admiration! and, not to be invidious, squinting John and Bully Bob claim a like consideration; for although these worthies have for the while been transplanted from neighboring cornfields, yet this is evidently their proper sphere; here "Richard is himself again." Sam shines forth with his furniture, apron and broad sash of red ribbon, in addition to his white pants, vest, gloves, and teeth, resplendent; a tuft of buzzard feathers stuck on his head would have converted him into a Pawnee brave. It is singular that these sable colored gentlemen become so patriotic on such occasions, for their liberty is of rather a restricted nature; and although the new constitution extends more liberty to the white man, it is of small advantage to the negro; yet we have known some of them who were orderly and well disposed for the rest of the year, whose patriotism would prompt them to keep the fourth of July for a fortnight, by getting drunk every day. There is a phenomenon connected with this which we will leave for wiser heads to solve. Twilight is the signal for returning home; the sparkling bowl has been emptied; hearts have been lost and won; the efficient managers have established their reputation, and the more humble and obsequious waiters have taken their last bow. The line of march is taken in procession; the town, which during the latter part of the day resembled a desert, is now teeming with life and animation, and all seem pleased with the occurrences of the day—scenes like these, oft repeated, have given us an enviable fame. Other villages may emit a transient lustre, but we have a permanent character to support; and as the Hawker of the east seeks those marts to dispose of his wares where are congregated the greatest number of pilgrims, so here resort a score of young persons from as many villages, offering their nite to the general felicity, knowing that all they contribute will be returned ten fold. Bachelors and Widowers seek this mart in search of wives; maids and widows seek it in search of pleasure. Friends make this period the time to visit, relations to gather home; brothers and sisters collect around the paternal hearth, and cousins swell the number; those meet who have long parted; every house almost has its quota of strangers, and this season like the old English Christmas holidays is devoted to pleasure. Those who are far from home and have been prevented from joining these festivities, will read with intense anxiety this description of what they have often realized, and the tear of regret will start as in retrospection they trace the faithfulness of the picture. PHILIP.
