The interest I have continually felt, and occasionally exhibited, in your welfare, you have accurately described in the beginning of your third resolution; while the latter part of it discloses, I have no doubt, your good wishes for my own; and I can assure you, my young friends, that no event in my life has given mo more unmixed delight than this unsolicited spontaneous testimonial of your esteom and friendship.—And though the pleasant relations we have for two years past sustained to each other are now dissolved, allow mo' to hope they may be renewed and continued in another form; and especially that, in coming life, whenever it may be my privilege to hear from you, the report may always be accompanied with the glad intelligence that your character for scholarship, manliness and moral integrity is 'growing with your growth; and strengthening with your strength.'
