After a moment's purloy with an old man in a brimless white hat, who a untered through the doorway at our approach, and nodded assent, with an air of dignified nonchalence, to our enger inquiries, we were little from our carriage, glad enough to unbend our atifiened intrough the window panes.

"Stay by pape, Ellie, pet!" said the mother, as she tied the little blue head under her chin, and pinned a warm, white blanket over the here dimpling should ders. "Lila go with pape!" laughed the little fairly, dancing pleefully under her unther's hands. "Come. Ellie." called pape, reaching out his hand, as he festened the last button of his working frock. She sprang to him, and swung her little self out of the door by his strong fore finger. The harn was just across the road from the house. Skipping up the platform, through the unfolding leaves of the great han door, she clapped her baby hands to the seampering chickens, shouling to the schoes, climbed up to peep through the rails at the "red calf" and scrainbiled down in terror of the cow's nervously shaking her horas. At last she trotted a transition of the ments, tossing and tunity ling on the new made hay, warbling like a merry harn swallow all the while. The faither was in and out, here and there, occupied with his varying busi. turing the one addressed. There—there is the house, away beyond that swell where four foods meet, and clumsey enough roads they are; too, to be aure!"

As we drew near to the house, a curiously huddled together combination of logs, mortar and whitewash, more from conveniume than elegance, we took noting of an opright pole in front of it, which once, avidently, held up a grateful invitation to goers by. But now it only creaked most tantalizingly und inhospitably in the wind.

A message had at first been sent to the grandpalrents—and coming with all possible speed, they arrived on the morning of third day. The poor father of the lost Ellen, worn out with fasting, watching pand agony, lell down in a swoon at his mother's feet, was he ruse to receive her. Mary was more enim; hand they said she let the pang loss keenly. Woman dike, she had learned to hide the thorn that was piercing her heart, and to smile while that heart bwas bleeding. That the child must have been stolen, seemed now to be the opinion of every one.

'Oh! I could bear to know that she is dead," were almost the first words of John Waring, on recovering from his fainting fit; "but this undertainty, this suspense, it will kill me."
