

AMERICAN VOLUNTEER.

JOHN G. BRATTON, Editor & Proprietor. CARLEISLE, PA., DEC. 7, 1864.

AMERICAN VOLUNTEER.—By the Sheriff's proclamation, published in another column, it will be seen that an adjourned Court of Common Pleas for Cumberland county, to continue one week, will commence at Carlisle, on Monday, 11th inst.

AMERICAN VOLUNTEER.—An early hour on Sunday morning last it commenced raining, and it has continued to fall without intermission until about 10 o'clock, A. M., covering the earth with a mantle of virgin white to the depth of about five inches. The weather is now clear, cold, and bright, the sleighing good, and the jingling of the merry sleigh bells has already been heard in our streets.

CONGRESS.—The second session of the Thirty-third Congress commenced at Washington City on Monday last. We shall by the Message of the President before our readers in our next paper. The bills to progress during the last session will be taken up in the days they had reached when the session adjourned. A session of Congress is always interesting, and this will probably attract as much notice as any which preceded it. The present Congress will expire by its own limitation on the 4th of March next.

Since writing the above, we have received a copy of the President's Message. It is about the usual length of such documents, and is in all respects an able State paper, many points being presented by the President both of Foreign and Domestic policy. All those who desire to hear American principles urged and defended in a bold, Democratic manner, should carefully read this Message.

DR. NEVIN'S LECTURE.—We trust none of our readers will fail to attend the lecture to be delivered to-night in Marion Hall, by the Rev. Dr. NEVIN. Dr. N. is now a new thinker of Carlisle, is learned and able man, a deep thinker, a close observer, a powerful reasoner, and is every way calculated to impart instruction in an agreeable and familiar manner. His subject—'Sabbath Education'—is one of great interest and importance, particularly to young men, and we should be pleased to see the Hall filled to overflowing on this occasion.

Our New County Officers.

On Friday last, the first list, our new County Officers, viz: DANIEL K. NOEL, Esq., Prothonotary; JOHN M. GARRO, Esq., Clerk of Courts; and WILLIAM LYLE, Esq., Register, entered upon the duties of their respective offices. Mr. Gregg retains Mr. Philip Quigley, the present popular and efficient Clerk in that office, as his assistant, and Mr. Noel and Mr. Lyle retain for the present the old incumbents, Mr. Zinn and Mr. Spangler.

We are certain that we but give utterance to the universal sentiment of the people of Cumberland county, when we say that during the incumbency of the late officers, Messrs. ZINN, MARRIS and SPENGLER, the business of their respective offices was never transacted in a better or more satisfactory manner. From prompt, accurate and energetic in the performance of their duties, they were also courteous and affable to those having business with them. In retiring to private life, they will carry with them the respect and good wishes of our entire community. Of the new officers we need say but little. They are all well known to the people of the county generally, and the unparalleled justice given them at the late election would evince that their constituents have full confidence in their honesty and ability. That they will not disappoint public expectation we have no doubt.

A New Paper in Carlisle.

We learn from the Harrisburg Telegraph that a new paper, devoted to the advocacy of the peculiar doctrines and tenets of Know-Nothingism, is shortly to be established in this place. Some weeks ago, we heard a rumor to the effect that a project for the establishment of such a journal was on foot, but believing that there were an abundance of papers in this county, we regarded it as mere idle talk. We had thought, too, that the Herald, of this place, as well as the News, of Shippenburg, both of which performed prominent service in the cause of that proscription party during the recent election campaign, would have been sufficient to promulgate their doctrines and keep the party together. But in this it appears that we were mistaken, and that the establishment of a real Simon Pure Know-Nothing organ is seriously contemplated. The Telegraph says: 'A new paper is to be started at Carlisle in a few weeks to advocate the principles of the American party. It will be a large and handsome sheet, one of the prominent features of which will be its adaptation to the wants of the American Family Circle. Prospectuses have been issued and a large number of subscribers already obtained.'

LOOK OUT FOR WORTHLESS MONEY.—Too much care cannot be observed in looking, at this time, paper money, especially that coming from other States and the Districts or fraudulent trash. There are also some counterfeit Quarter Eagles in circulation, as we have heretofore stated, which require a close examination to detect.

GEN. CASS.—The Detroit Times says the assumption that Gen. Cass had laid aside all aspirations for the Presidency, is entirely gratuitous. 'His friends will hurry his name forward in their own time, and he will be a candidate before the National Convention.'

THE SCHUYLER FRAUD.—We are glad to hear that Judge Hoffman, of New York, has decided that the stock of the New Haven Railroad Company, alleged to have been fraudulently issued by Mr. Schuyler, is good and valid stock, and must come in pro rata with the other portion of the stock, on the capital of $3,000,000. The principle upon which he based his decision was, that the stockholders having authorized Mr. Schuyler to issue stock, and thereby to bring in new partners, they are bound by his acts. Nothing could be juster—no honest man expected any other decision from an honest Judge, notwithstanding the efforts of the board of managers to throw the loss upon their recognized holders of this stock, issued by an official with reduced liabilities. The effect will be to reduce the value of the whole of the stock, (including the alleged fraudulent issue,) so as to make the aggregate equal the capital by law.

CHARLES A. STEWART, Assistant door-keeper at Washington, committed suicide last week. Cause—aberration of mind caused by excessive use of strong drink. He was much respected, quite popular, and had accumulated considerable property.

R. P. FLEMING, Esq., of Fayette county, in this State, now on a visit to Kansas, is a candidate for Delegate to Congress from that Territory.

MORE IMPROVEMENTS IN OUR BOROUGHS.

Some time during the last summer, we noticed in our columns several new buildings which had recently been erected in the borough, and we will now endeavor to complete the list.

NEW COUNTY PRISON.—This magnificent structure is now completed, we believe, in all its parts, and already there are some prisoners confined within the limits of its massive walls. This prison is undoubtedly one of the strongest, handsomest and best finished in the State, and the beauty of its architectural proportions, the height and graceful symmetry of its towers, together with the central position which it occupies, make it 'an observed of all observers,' of the citizens of our own county as well as of strangers from abroad. It is now the chief ornament of the borough, and it will probably occupy its present position for centuries, bidding defiance to the effects of time, and regardless of the tempests of that oft-timed dangerous element, fire, to injure or destroy it. The people of this borough owe a debt of gratitude to our County Commissioners for locating in Carlisle so beautiful, classic and durable an edifice. Mr. HAZARD, the architect, also deserves much credit for the plan furnished by him of so splendid a building. It evinces that, as an architect, he has no superior in the country. Messrs. H. MYERS and J. GREGGALL were the Contractors.

The new German Evangelical Lutheran church is already under roof, and it is supposed it will be finished and ready for the accommodation of the congregation who purpose worshipping in it, by the first of January next. It is really a very neat and handsome building, built of brick, and admirably adapted to the purpose for which it is designed. Besides the apartment intended for public worship, there is a large and commodious room which will be devoted to the use of the Sabbath School, and also to the delivery of religious lectures. Our German fellow-citizens may be justly proud of their new and handsome church edifice, and they deserve praise for the admirable enterprise and perseverance which they have evinced in the erection of it. It is situated on the north-west corner of Pomfret and Bedford streets. Messrs. MYERS and GREGGALL are the Contractors.

The new Public School House, in East Louther street, has been finished for some time, and is now occupied by two of the Common Schools. It is a large and handsome brick edifice, well suited to the purpose for which it is intended. On the rear of the same lot is a very pretty small brick school house, for the accommodation of the colored children of the borough. Carlisle, through its Board of School Directors, is now possessed of a large number of convenient and valuable school houses, sufficient, we believe, to supply all the present wants of the borough as regards school purposes. The Directors are certainly entitled to the gratitude of our whole community, for the firm and active part which they have for years taken to advance the great cause of popular education in this borough.

In addition to the public buildings above enumerated, we may mention a few private ones erected during the course of the past summer, and which we have not before noticed.

On South Pitt street, John Moll, Esq., has had erected a substantial two and a half story brick tenement house. This building is situated in a pleasant and healthy part of the town, and is a very pretty and elegant private residence.

On the south-west corner of Pomfret and West streets, Mr. James Hoffer, having removed an old and dilapidated log cabin which for years cluttered the spot, has erected on its site a large and commodious three story brick building, which is attached a very extensive brick back building. Several elegant dwelling houses have been put up in that neighborhood within a few years past.

On North Hanover street, a large and handsome two story brick building has been erected by Frederick Coriman, Esq., in the lower front of which is located his extensive Cabinet-ware depot.

On the same street, J. B. Parker, Esq., having removed an ugly and venerable tenement, has had erected an elegant brick building, which is well calculated as a stand for almost any kind of business, as well as for a pleasant private residence. To the building adjoining the above, owned by Dr. S. B. Kleiser, an additional story has been added, and it has been otherwise improved and beautified.

On the corner of North and East streets, Mr. Daniel Bailey has erected a large and convenient brick dwelling house, which adds much to the appearance of that section of the borough.

On East South street, two very eligible two story brick tenement houses have been built by Mr. Henry Myers, and which are owned by him. They are well adapted for the accommodation of private families.

On South Bedford street, a new two story frame building has been erected by Mr. Andrew Martin, which he intends himself to occupy.

There have been other buildings erected in the borough during the past summer, but we have already noticed them in former numbers. There may be others, also, which we have omitted to notice in this article. If so, we will make mention of them in a future issue.

SENATORS TO ELECT.—At the approaching session of the respective Legislatures there will be Senators of the United States to elect in Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Arkansas, Missouri, Louisiana, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, New York, Maine, and California. New Hampshire will elect two in May next.

J. Lawrence Getz, Esq., editor of the Reading Gazette, has resigned his Clerkship in the Philadelphia Custom House. Reason: he finds that he could not serve two masters; and prefers to remain at his editorial post.

LIQUOR LAW CONVICTED.—Zacharia Potter, a hotel-keeper at Cambridge, Mass., has been convicted of selling liquor on eighteen indictments, and sentenced to pay a fine of $350, and be imprisoned four years. He appeals.

EX-PRESIDENT FILLMORE.—Among a list of wealthy citizens of New York, published in the New York Sun, is ex-President Fillmore, whose property is valued at $150,000.

MARY O. BAKER, 'tried at St. Louis for killing Hoffman, has been acquitted. The accused, with her father, mother, child and other relatives were present when the acquittal was announced, and the scene is reported to have been deeply affecting. She has been confined in jail since April last.

IT is stated that the monks in the neighborhood of Trinidad are dying, in great numbers, of cholera. Persons who have passed through the woods report that hundreds are to be seen lying dead on the ground, where they have fallen from the trees. It is said the same thing was observed while the small pox epidemic prevailed in Trinidad, the monasteries dying of this disease in equally large numbers.

MR. HENRY A. WASH has been nominated by the Democrats of Virginia as their candidate for Governor.

SORROW FOR THE DEAD.

The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the convulsive agony over the present ruins of all that we most loved is soothed away into pensive meditation on all that it was in the days of its loveliness, who would not wish to see such a sorrow from the heart? It may sometimes throw a passing cloud over the bright eye of gaiety, or spread a deeper sadness over the hour of gloom, yet it would exchange it even for the song of pleasure, or the burst of revelry? No, there is a voice from the tomb ever stirring the soul. There is a recollection of the dead which we turn, even from the charms of the living. Oh, the grave! the grave! it buries every error, covers every defect, extinguishes every resentment—From its peaceful bosom spring nobles who look regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection. Who can fondly regret and tender recollection.

THE SORROW FOR THE DEAD.—The sorrow for the dead is the only sorrow which we refuse to be divided. Every other sorrow we seek to heal—every other affliction to forget; but this would we consider it a duty to keep open—this affliction we cherish and brood over in solitude. Where is the mother that would willingly forget the infant that perished like a blossom from her arms, though every recollection is a pang? Where is the child that would willingly forget the mother that died in the hour of agony, would forget the friend over whom he mourns? Who, even when the tomb is closing upon the remains of her most loved, and she feels his heart, as it were, crushed in the dosing of its portals, would adopt consolation that was to be brought by forgetfulness? No, the loved who survives the tomb, is one of the noblest attributes of the soul. If it has its own, it has likewise its delights, and when the overwhelming burst of grief is calmed into the gentle tear of recollection—when the sudden anguish and the conv