THE FATHER.

Let It is the duty of moties to sustain the reyerse; of, fortune. There is a sudden as they have been in our own country, it is important that young females should possess some employment; by which, they might obtain a livelihood, in case they should be reduced to the necessity of supporting themselves. When families are unexpectedly reduced from affluance to poverty, how putifully contemptible it is to, see the mother, desponding, of fielpless, and permitting her daughters to embarrass those whom it is their duty to assist and cheer.

"It have lost my whole fortune," said a men'

"Pay every debt," said his wife. "Let no cone suffer through us; and we may be happy." It rented a neat cottage and a small piece of ground a few miles from the city. With the aid of his son, he cultivated regetables for the market. He viewed with delight and astonishment the economy of his wife, nurtured as she had been in wealth, and the efficiency which his daughters soon acquired under her training.

Then turning to his crew; the pirate chief said in husky tones.

Côme, boys, let us go on board. His men flerce and determined fellows as they were went muttering over the side, and I saw more than one of them half unsheath his knife, and second, coverily at his captain. THE TWO BROTHERS.

Pedigree and Ingrain were brothers, child parents in comfortable circumstances.

and mainings were totally dissimilar.

Each was born with a peculiar eccentricity of character. That of Pedigree was to occupy, or all occasions, an elevated position; that of English to shrink out of all observation.

No sooner had they tearned the difference in positions, than these eccentricities manifested themselves. Pedigree circle to be placed upon the table, ingrain to sit beneath it. It they were put to bed, the former chose to be just in, the latter under it, nor would any pershasion pacify them, until their wishes were graffied.

Whey they first began to come to table, not thing would satisfy Pedigree, but a very high chair to sit in, and a stool for his plate to stand on, that he might cat his victuals above all the rest. On the courterly, his borther would not partake of a monthful unless it was under the table, and upon the very floor.

These whims gave great trouble to fine parents, and this brother would not partake of a monthful unless it was under the table, and upon the very floor.

This gave increased discomfort to all concerned, and introdited the greatest confusion into the household, especially when company was present—for the smoking dishes perturned the whole house; one, set of servants promending through the balls to the cellar, and an other to the chambers above.

These eccentricities at length proceeded to such an extent that Pedigree most needs have a timing room built to the toe of the house, and
