AN EVENING LANDSCAPE.

FROM THE GERMAN OF PRIEDRICH MATTHESSON

Bright the wood, In golden flood; Falls a soft and magic glory On the Waldburg ruins hoary.

Homoward float, Still remote, Fishing craft, with swan-like motion, O'er the ground, smooth gleaming occur

Embower'd there--

With its garden-plat, and welling Fount, the mossy hermit-dwelling.

Doth sunlight wane;
Dies away the magic glory
From the Waldburg ruins hoary.

A QUESTION FOR THE SAVANS.

A QUESTION FOR THE SAVANS.

The most revolting crimes which have ever been perpetrated—those which have shocked humanity by the very redinement of their barbarity—those which have most completely folied the utmost exertions of the subtlest minds to unvoll—or those which have excited in many bosoms a certain morbid feeling of admiration for the ingenuity and daring displayed—have been the acts of that sex to which we are went to attribute all human virtues—the amiabilities, the amenities, the gentleness and tender-heart-claness of our race—have been the acts of loving and lovable woman. Now we would not be understood to malign the sex—far from it indeed; we only speak of those who have unsexed themselves; and with regard to them, that what we have said is true, the records of both ancients and moderns fully prove. We do not now refer to those crimes which have been openly, and in many cases, hoastingly avowed; we have in our mind those secret assassinations, those mysterious poisonings, and those strange disappearance, with the recical of which our childish days were filled and terrifled, and with which our instance of the secret.

Does one of our coarser sex attempt some vil-Does one of our coarser sex attempt some villainous doed? I the chances are ten to one that he leaves some clue to his detection, and exposes himself by the clumsiness of his concealment. But does timid, fearful woman undertake to do violence to her nature, see how effectually, how completely the thing is managed. No tell-tale blood is left, by which to trace the perpetrator—no dagger is carclessly dropped or ill-concealed—no polson-dregs are found, to bear testimony against the destroyer. All is cleanly, carefully, and adroitly done, an exact system is observed, and everything is provided for and foreseen; in word, the wonder is if the slightest evidence remains to fix the atrocious deed. We may be morally certain who the guilty one is, but we morally certain who the guilty one is, but we are almost compelled legally to declare her innocent. Now we do not protend to say that none of the villanies of man have exhibited equal care, and equal cunning, or have been attended with equal good fortune, it we may use the term; or that woman has always shown a perfect ability to evade the detection of her crimes; but we do unhesitatingly assert, and we think we are borne out by the records of criminality, that there is no paralell between the success of the two saxes in such cases. In short, in perpetrating any enormity, the one is a wretched bungler, the other the completes of adopts. He is a tyro, she a mistrees norally certain who the guilty one is, bu ing any chiormity, the one is a vertene bungler, the other the completest of adepts. He is a tyro, she a mistress.

How are we to account for all this? We confess our inability. We know that the passions in voman are very strong, perhaps stronger than in man. We have been told that "Heil hath no fury like a woman scorned." We can readily understand, then, why the animus should exist;
we can comprehend why an intensely passionate woman should desire to desirely a successful rival, or remove from her path a dangerous or hated man whose tyranny or disclosures she dreadded. We can understand, we think, how she is impelled to crime; but how it is that she is so generally successful in evading the consequences, is puzzling indeed. We come to-this conclusion, that there are certain pocularities in the mental constitution of woman; that she possess attributes essentially distinct from man;
and that many which are common to both seeks. and goes; and it of it, as not controlled the pans, be added the lower attribute of cunning, we have two principles which serve, one as a stimulus, the other as guide—passion urges on, instinct and cunning safely and stealthily guide the way. But another trait almost peculiar to woman, is modesty, which constitutes one of the most attractive of her charms. Now, we take it that no female possessing and preserving this quality, can be guilty of any great crime.—But should this strong barrier be once destroyed, not only is there left an open way for crime, but there is even a very material aid to it thereby ongendered; for modesty destroyed, is ever succeeded by concealment

by ongendered; for modesty destroyed, is ever succeeded by concealment

If what we have said be true, and they are but crude ideas of our own, we think that upon this basis, the successful concealment of crime imputed to woman can be explained. But if we are wrong, we must leave it to the savans to set us right.—Reading Gazette.

A Good Picture or of Chicago is thus described by a correspond to Boston Journal:

"He stands six feet five in his stockings.—
Old straw hat turned down all around like a cotton umbrella—no neckeloth—short, bad fitting the stand badn't are into them and hadn't A Good Picture or a Mayor.—The Mayor Chicago is thus described by a corresponder linen coat—loose unmentionables which look as if he had jumped too far into them and hadn't time to got back—unblackened, united shoes, three sizes too large and a slight steep to the tall figure, and the picture is complete. You see him?—Well, sir, that shabby, clophantine individual, who looks as it he had not a cent in the world, is Johannes Elongatus, Mayor of Chicago, and he is worth flyo hindred thousand dollars.

REFLECTIONS ON MARRIAGE.—The leading features in the character of a good woman are mildness, complaisance and equanimity of temper. The man, if he be a worthy and provident husband, is immersed in a thousand cares. His mind is egitated, his memory is loaded, and his body fatigued. He returns from the bustle of the world, chagrined perhaps by disappointment, angry at insolent and, perfidious preople, and terrified lest his unavoidable connections should make him appear perfidious himself. Is this the time for the wife of his bosom, his dearest and most intimate friend, to boson, his dearest and most intimate friend, to add to his vexation, to increase the fever of an overburdened mind by a contentious tongue, or a discontented brow? Business, in its most a discontented brow? Business, in its most prosperous state, is full of anxiety and turmoil. Oh! how dear to the memory of man is the wife who clothes her face with smiles, who uses gentlo expressions, and who makes her lap soft to receive and hush his cares to rest. There is not in nature so fascinating an object as the faithful, tender and affectionate wife.

When it is not despicable to be poor, we fact fewer things to live in poverty with satis wanton than to live magnificently with riches.
