pend upon it there was no part of the annual message of the President better founded upon fact, or that more readily found its verification, than that portion which declares that Kansas has for years occupied too much of the public attention; and that it is high time this attention should be directed to far more important objects. The stern injunction of the people was that the denunciation over the Kansas question and the slavery question should be stopped, and with the spirit of these injunctions time, so significantly and patriotically given to them by the Chief Magistrate, and throw the "nigger" question out of Congress in some way, and at the earliest possible moment. He contended for the constitutional right of the people to adopt or prohibit the institution of slavery as they deemed fit—the same privilege which his own State has had, and still has, to regulate their institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. He had, therefore, nothing to say upon this exhausted and rejected issue that had been the practice of the American States."
