

DIET AND DIGESTION.

Our good neighbors the French, or rather the philosophers among them, have asserted that the perfecting of man and species depends in an attention to diet and digestion; and in a material point of view, they are not far wrong; and indeed, in a non-material point of view, it may be said that the spirit which judges, and is very likely to be exposed to indignation, and perhaps ignorance complete is to be preferred to an ill-digested erudition. With diet and patience, Walpole thought all diseases of man could be easily cured. Montesquieu, on the other hand, held that health purchased by rigorously watching over diet, was but a tedious disease. But Walpole was nearly correct, while Montesquieu was very distant from the truth. Dieting, like other things, must be undertaken on common-sense principles; for, though there be multitudes of mad people in the world, society generally is not to be put upon the regime of "Beaumont's Pills."
