And weary labor seeks repose,
When the wind blows fierce and keen;
But the fireman, as to bed he goes,
Thinks of his "Old Machine."

Then see him lie between the sheets, While dreams his thoughts confound His anxious heart, how quick it beats! For he hears a sudden sound. He starts! he springs upon his feet, Exclaims, "what can this mean?"

He runs for the "Old Machine." "Be quick, take suction, lead out hose." Man breaks, and play away,

While the cry of fire! his senses meet,

Now break her down, ye eager foes
Of fire's dreadful sway;
Be willing now, don't mind your toes, We soon shall sweep it clean, For water in a torrent flows From our darling "Old Machine."

And now the crowd is leaving fast, Again to seek repose; But I have heard an order passed, "Come wash that dirty hose!"
"It's 'rinse them down," and "Boys, be smart Make haste and get them clean, Then reel them on that little cart, Behind the "Old Machine.

And now good night, my song's complete, - And ye may all retire: We do not know but when we meet,

It may be at a fire; Of this be sure—at danger's call, We hastily convene; or friend or foe, alike for all, We fetch our "Old Machine."
