STORIES FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

MAGGIE'S PRETTY SHAWL.

It was a cold day in November; thoroughly unpleasant, with its wind and lowering aky. Two little girls were going home from school late in the afternoon, hughing and chatting as they harried along.
"Haven't I a pretty shawl?" said Miss Maggie, glancing approvingly at the gay soft blanket she wore "Indeed you have!" responded Miss Carrie. "It is the prettiest one I have seen this fall. I wish I had one like it."

"Ask your mother to buy you one, Carrie."
"Ask your mother to buy you one, Carrie."
"It will do no good" and carrie shook her head sadly. "She talks nothing but economy this fall, and all because of the war. We had nothing but hard times since it began." "What do you mean by hard times?" asked "What do you mean by hard times?" asked Maggie, gravely. "You have everything as nice as ever. Only think of your beautiful house and splendid piano."

"What of those?" returned Carrie, rather petulantly. "Mother talks of nothing but economy and hospitals, and soldiers' families and factory girls. If I ask for anything piece and pretty seek tells with results." nice and pretty, she talks with me until the matter ends in my giving the price of the ar-ticle wished for to somebody who is poor." "It's too bad that you can't have a pretty shawl," said Maggie. "All the girls have been wishing for one like mine."

Maggie heard very little about economy at home, and less of hospitals and suffering poor, home, and less of hospitals and suffering poor, Her mother was a worldly woman, absorbed in fushionable society. Maggie had a worm, generous heart, but she had been taught to look upon beggars as impostors, and to treat them accordingly. Carrie had been differently educated. Her father was a Christian gentleman of wealth and high standing, and her mother was devontly given to good works. her mother was devoutly given to good works. Although accustomed to hearing the poor talked of, she knew but little of their sufferings, as she seldom went with her mother to visit them, and avoided listening to the sad stories told at their door. Indeed she had sometimes wished that her mother was more like Maggie's, caring less for the poor and more for worldly display. "How lonesome and dreary the old factory looks now-a-days," said Maggie, when they came in sight of the great stone building, with its long rows of staring windows. An oppressive silence filled the spot, for the noisy clattering of the machinery had been stopped, soon after the commencement of our national difficulties, and a multitude of "hands" had thus been turned out of employment-deprived of bread. "It's a dismal place," said Carrie. "Let's run and get out of sight of it as soon as we can," and off they started on a brisk run, and were making wonderful progress for two sedate little girls, when they were suddenly stopped by a cheery voice calling out to

"What's the matter? Are you running away from school! I can't let you pass, however, without giving me a word," and Mr. Butler," the rector of the church they attend; ed, stood before them, extending both hands, one for each of the panting little girls. "I see now where your rosy cheeks come from," said he. "Make sure of rosy, cheeks now, if you ever wish to have them. "We were running away from the old fac-tory," said Maggie. "It is such a dismal

"I hope it reminds you," said he, very gravely, "of the many poor people among us who are now out of employment, and suffer ing for the necessaries of life."
"Is any one so poor;" asked Maggie.
"Mother talks of nothing but factory girls nown-days," said Carrie.

"I wish every Christian woman would think and do for them as much as she does," said Mr. Butler. "Few know of the suffering in that street," and he pointed to a narrow one near by, lined with tenement houses. "I am going now to see a poor widow woman who has two children lying very sick. She is entirely destitute. She lost her only son at the battle of Bull Run." "Oh, let us go with you," said Maggie, her "Have they really nothing to eat? I wish I had some mon-ey with me."

"I have a few shillings," said Carrie "which mother gave me for a new net, but they shall have it if they need it." Come with me, of course," said Mr. Butler, affected by their earnest sympathy. "I doubt if you will ever forget the lesson you will learn to-night." The two little girls followed him clinging close to his side as they passed the wretched houses from which haggard faces peered cur-iously at them. Children were running barefooted over the cold pavements, and babies were crying piteously in rooms where there was little light and no fire." "Nearly all of these people used to work in the factory," said Mr. Butler. "Now they are out of employment, and can find none.— Most of the men have entered the army, but their families are suffering here." Ascending a steep, rickety staircase, they reached the abode of the poor woman they sought. The door was opened by a ragged little girl, who as soon as she saw the rector. tegan crying aloud, and repeated over and over that the baby was dead. The good man spoke soothingly to her, and they followed her into the dimly lighted room.

A thin, pale woman sat before a fireplace in which a few coals were smouldering, hold-ing her dead baby in her arms. She was not weeping; neither did she speak or raise her. eyes at their approach. Upon a bed, in the corner of the room, lay a sick child, who, when she saw the little girls, beckened for them to come near her.

"I am so hungry," said she; "and my mother don't hear me when I tell her so. Won't you give me some bread? Only a lit-

"We will bring you some," said Maggie. They quickly left the room, and hastening to a bakery in the neighborhood, soon returned with bread and cakes, and a few rosy apples. Mr. Butler was consoling the poor widow, but their movements did not pass unobservedly by him. The little girl who opened the door sat down upon the bed beside her sister, and Carrie wept to see the

'You may have it," she said. "It will keep you warm when you have no fire."

"Oh how pretty it is!" and the sunken eyes beamed with delight, "and how warm! I wish baby had of had this last night when she cried because she was so cold."

"But how can you go home without your hawl?" asked Mr. Butler when they were hidding the poor family good night. "Will you not take cold?"

We are receiving our spring supply of Carpets, comprising all the various kinds kept in a first class. Carpet House. Carpets ranging in price from 12½ to 1.25. Oil Cloths, all widths. All the above goods and many others; we offer to purchasers at a small advance above cost.

"Oh, no," replied Maggie, cheerfully; we have but a little way to go, and we walk fast;

I am not afraid of taking cold."

"Oh, we are so glad, we went with you," said Carrie, when they reached the street.—
"I did not know before how poor people can be."

"I am glad you have had an opportunity of doing good," said Mr. Butler; "and I hope that your interest in these poor people will not end to-night."

"It shall not," said Maggie. "How I do love to think of that poor sick child, lying under my pretty shawl! She won't get cold to-night, I am sure of that."
