[From the American Agriculturist.]
THE WINE QUESTION. Grapes will, in many localities, be ripe this month, and it will be expected that we shall say something about wine making. To those who intend to make any considerable quantities of wine, we cannot do any better service than to commend to them M. Husmann's excellent treatise on Grapes and Wine. In October, 1864, we gave the process as followed in a small way, and we very briefly recapitulate it. Let the grapes be thoroughly ripe, pick out all decayed ones, and grind them in a mill that will not crush the seeds, or pound them in a barrel. the seeds, or pound them in a barrel.— The pulp is allowed to stand from one t The pulp is allowed to stand from one to three days, according to the desired quality of the winc. The longer it stands the more color and astringency it will acquire; for light wines, one day is enough. The juice is then to be pressed from the pulp and put into a perfectly clean cask to ferment. The cask being filled, it is closed by a bung, which has fixed in it a tin or glass tube bent into the form of a syphon, or twice at right angles. The syphon, or twice at right angles. The open end of this tube dips under the surface of water in a cup or other vessel, and allows the gas produced during fermentation to escape, while it completely excludes air from the contents of the cask. When active fermentation has ceased, the cask is bunged tightly, and left for two or three months, or until the wine becomes clear. The wine is then carefully racked off from the less and transferred to a Jean cask. Usually another, but less violent, fermentation sets in the following spring, and after this is over the wine may be bettled. This is over the wine may be and after this is over the wine may be bottled. This is a rough outline of the process, which should in every part be conducted with the greatest care and cleanliness, using no casks or other vessels that can impart any flavor to the wine. This is the process of the best makers, to produce wine from the fermented juice of the grape, without any addition. We headed this article the "wine question," as there is a question that has been tion," as there is a question that has been discussed by our western vicinites, with more or less acrimony on both sides. One side holds that wine should be the fermented natural juice of the grape and nothing else. The other side maintains, that in some seasons the grape does not contain sufficient sugar to make wine while it has all the necessary acids and other constituents. They have a process other constituents. They have a process of testing—which it would take too long to describe here—by which the amount of both acids and sugar is ascertained, and when there is a deficiency of sugar they add enough to make up the quantity to that of normal must. This is the case stated in brief, and the question, whether this is a proper procedure, is one which is likely to make still more discussion among wine makers. There are good arguments for both sides, and we are not yet prepared to express an opinion, except so far as to say that the claim that cept so far as to say that the claim that grape sugar makes wine, and that cane sugar makes rum—has no foundation in fact. Perfectly pure cane sugar, and pure-grape sugar in fermentation will yield al-cohol precisely the same, and it is only the associated matters that make wine of one and rum of the other. We know that it is not safe to advocate the doctoring of wines in any way, as in bad kinds it is liable to abuse. We know, on the other hand, that our people are paying large sums for imported and California wines that have been treated in this very way and even worse, as some of the so-called California wines are vile compounds, for-tified with brandy. As it is likely that we shall be a wine-making people to a considerable extent, it is important that we come to some understanding upon this matter, and if only the product of unsugared grape juice is to be considered wine between the Atlantic and the Rocky mountains, let us have it so arranged that wines made otherwise elsewhere shall not be allowed to be sold.

TOPPING CORN AND CORN FODDER.

We are in little danger of over estimating the value of well-cured, or only tolerably well-cured, corn-fodder. As feed for milch cows it is hardly surpassed by very good upland hay, and has to encounter only one serious drawback, namely it must be cut up fine, salted and wet up with a little meal, bran, or oil cake of with a little meal, bran, or oil cake of some sort, in order to get the full benefit. The necessity of spending so much labor upon it detracts from its value, so that while in New England a farmer may perhaps afford to pay two-thirds what he would have to pay for hay, at the West, where fair hay may be had for the cutting and hauling, its value is less in proportion. Still, fed whole, it is highly relished by all kinds of stock, and constitutes the chief living of the young stock in winthe chief living of the young stock in win-ter over a large portion of the Northern States. At the West the great corn-fields, upon which the stalks are left standing after the ears are picked offently. after the ears are picked, afford winter feed, poor and weathered though it is, which helps many a herd through that might perish otherwise in the hard winters.

When the corn-stalks are very large, it when the corn-sunks are very large, it is hardly worth while to attempt to cure the big butts and cut them up for fodder. There is probably a small gain in the weight of the grain, if after the kernels glaze well the corn be cut up at the ground, rather than topped apove the ears. Yet glaze well the corn be cut up at the ground, rather than topped apove the ears. Yet where the great dent corn is planted, we incline decidedly to the opinion that there is a decided advantage gained when it is topped, and the tops and suckers (earless sidestalks) are well cured.

The practice at the South of breaking out the suckers together with the lower

The practice at the South of breaking out the suckers together with the lower leaves of the corn, while yet it is green and the ears not glazed, certainly affords a very exellent fodder, and, if enough of the strong growing suckers, which would make good male flowers, be allowed to stand to fertilize the tips of the ears, it is probably economical. Where the small kinds of corn are grown as throughout Canada, New England, and New York, we regard it as a poor policy and a loss of we regard it as a poor policy and a loss of fodder to top corn for the sake of getting a kind of fodder which the cattle will eat up clean if not chaffed. With a little poins and labor but a little a kind of lodder which the cattle will entup clean if not chaffed. With a little pains and labor, but a very small portion of the stalks are refused by the stock.

Dr. R., of Hartford Co., Conn., had a cornstalk stack accidently putup too green, (or perhaps, it got thoroughly rain soaked,) so that it heated, and the interior came into a condition of very active fer mentation. The result was, that he thought it mostly ruined, and as soon as he could, threw off the uniture portions to save them, and thus opened what appeared to be a mass of corruption beneath. The butts were the only parts which retained their form, all the rest was a brownish or black mass, smelling, however, not unpleasantly. The cows showed their preference at once by rejecting the sound stalks, and eating the others, the softened ones, with great gusto. The fermentation had proceeded just so far as to form the famous "brown hay," the stalks being soft, sweet and flaversome. The Doctor has, we believe, repeated the operation with success. has, we believe, repeated the operation with success.

BEST CORN BREAD.—Make a thick batter of 1 quart of sweet milk and 1 quart of butter-milk, 1 tablespoonful of saleratus and 1 of salt, 1 teacup molasses, 2 teacupfuls of wheat flour or (shorts), and corn meal enough to thicken it. Bake two hours in an oven a little hotter than two hours in an oven a little hotter than for wheat bread. A loaf still nicer, especially for poor teeth, is made by using half the above quantity, steaming it three hours, and then baking enough to just brown the top nicely.—"Laura," Cooper, Mich.

CORN DODGERS.—Salt and scald sifted corn meal. When cool wet the hands in cold water and mould into cakes like biscults, but not very thick. Bake rather slowly, on agridle, in hot fat, browning for the side and then the other Split first one side and then the other. Split open and eat while hot, with butter or syrup, or with meat and gravy.—Contributor's name not given.
