I had heard—who has not? of the fertility of their soil, of the beauty of their scenery, of the healthfulness of their climate, of the wonderful development, which has as if by the magic of a farry's wand, con-verted their forests into farms and clites I had read from one who wrote with a master's power of these great central plains, where the St. Lawrence and the Mississippi kiss each other before their separate for their long journeys to the occans, above which the sun at its zeniti seems to linger in admiration for a mo-ment in its ceaseless course to the Pacific, where the icy blasts of the north are melt-ed to cool breezes in the warm embrace of the sultry winds of the south, and where under the influence of all that is beautiful in nature and all that is impres-sive in the character of a people made up of all the families of our Caucasian race, the soul of an American clitzen rises to the full measure of his country's opportu-nities and his own duties. But I wished to see them with my own eyes, to know them by my own experience, that I might; nities and his own duties. But I wished to see them with my own eyes, to know them by my own experience, that I might, by the intimacy of personal association, warm up still more, if that is possible, the fervor of my patriotism, and add one more to the unnumbered ties of affection and admiration and interest which bind my heart to my country. I desired es-pecially to visit Minnesota, for, like him to whom I have alluded I was one of pecially to visit Minnesota, for, like him to whom I have alluded, I was one of those who aided in admitting her to the Union-(applause)-and welcoming her to the full possession of all the powers and rights and dignities of the original States.
