''Mother, I need not ask you if you be-lieve this infamous lie. And O, how could Marie? Well, I must go to her wherever she is. It will be unpleasant to see Mr. and Mrs. L'Estrange, but I shall go and claim my wife.'
''Yes, John, go. I believe it is your duty to see her and prevail on her to come home. Believe the letter! You know I do not; but do not blame Marie to harshly. It was a terrible blow to her young and trusting heart.'
''But nothing could ever have shaken my confidence in her, mother!' said John, mournfully, as he turned away from the door.
'L'Estrange never did things by halves. His wily cunning had assisted to fax the fact of John's guilt deeply in the mind of Marie; and he persuaded her that a meeting between them would be fruitless and even wrong. She permitted her father to say that she could not meet bim under any circumstances whatever, and John, well-nigh distracted with grief and vague feeling of revenge toward some one, he knew not whom, went home to his desolate chamber, and passed the night in an agony that may not be de-scribed.

After that time, he made numerous in-pet, and discovered, to her dismay, that it bore the London postmark. What strange's hand sonding her the dread-ful news? 'Mrs. Holland, singing softly to her-self, unconscious of all trouble, looked in to the room. Marie was holding an open letter in her trembling hand, while her tearless eyes were fixed and stony. Ilke those of a statute. 'A flask of some perume stood on the fabe against which Marie leaned. Mrs. Holland bathed her face and hands until she lost that terrible look. She asked not a word. Marle should tell her when she grew better; but all the while the mother's heart foreboded that the lether hows. But Mrs. Holland should have received the Heir, bearing stool moved to think over probabilities now.— Marie's state demanded instath help, and she was thankful when she heard Mr. Holland's steps approaching. He took Marle in his arms and laid her on her own bed, and then Mrs. Holland gave him the letter that had thus shaken the poor young wife. ''What is it? aked the mother, as she marked the pale face grew paler at the reading. 'What is it? Ah, I know! My Holland's steps approaching. He took Marle in his arms and laid her on her oory wusgelf. Louisa' said Mr. Hol-hon. But some base person has tra-duced him, and sent the si aft home will, for augurt i' what is it? Ah, I know! strain of entreaty which it breathed. 'Six months! and that letter, the very embodiment of that woman's soul, had never reached the hand for which it was intended. What prayers and supplica-tions had arisen to the great while throne that it might touch the heart of John Holland! Holland! indext to meet him; but to his surprise, no such pleasant reception awaited him. He entered the house and made his way to the little room where his wife and mother had always sat in the morning.— Marie was not there, and his mother met him with an air of singular constraint that alarmed and confounded him.

'' Are you not glad to see me mother?' he asked. 'Why do you look at me so strangely, and where is Marie? I must go to her this instant.'
'' He ran up stairs. For the life of her, Mrs. Holland could not arouse courage enough to stay his steps. He went to Marie's chamber. All the gifts were there. The toilet, the bureau, even the bed, were strewn with them. You can faintly imagine how the poor fellow must have felt. He came down again to his mother. Something had happened—something dreadful he was sure.
'' Is she dead, mother?' he asked, his poor, pale, quivering lips attesting to the true love he bore her.
'' No, John, Marie is living and well, for aught I know, but she is not here.'
'' Her tongue refused to tell him the tale; but after Marie had gone, she had found the diabolical letter that had caused all the misery, lying twisted upon the floor, and she now produced it for John's perusal.
'' And she belleves this, Mother?' he naked, as a sparm of intense paln crossed bis face.
