It was January. John left his home, some eighteen miles away, taking a bag of provisions and a few spring trans, to be absent a week or more, in pursuit of mink and marten. It was an open season. Little snow was upon the ground, and all the lakes were unfrozen. John made his way alone to the Lower Cedar lake, deposited his provision bag in the log shanty, and taking his boat and traps, rode overly the little island which has just been des-cribed. Running the boat up on the rocks, he stepued out with a trap, and went to the opposite side of the island, a distance not exceeding twenty-five feet, carefully set his trap and returned to the landing.
