THE YOUNG FRANC-TIREUR. What I am about to tell relates to one of my Franc-Tireurs. My Lieutenant presented him one evening at the blyouac. He told me that he had a volbivouac. He told me that he had a volunteer, and I did not expect to see a child with a slender figure, soft blue eyes, and the smile of a girl. He had long, light hair, which curied over his forehead with silky softness, like those of a madonna. The fact is that he was not my ideal of a soldier, and his blonde curls displeased me.

'Do you take my company for a girl's boarding school?' said I, to the Lieutenant. 'Where the devil did you fish out this young girl?'

The young man blushed; however, he preserved a calm face.

'Ah!' said Delphine. 'I have a sick riend who longs for strawberries, and little man unlocked it, saying, 'If you go straight forward, you will find what you seek.'

Delphine would have thanked the good natured little man, but he had vanquished, so she went on a few steps further and came to a green slope. Here winter had disappeared; the sun shone warmer in a blue cloudless sky, the birds sang merrily, and, a few steps on, she came to a spot where the ground was covered with the finest ripe strawberries. How the good little malden rejoiced! She quickly filled the little basket she had brought with her, and started back to her dear sick Hilda.

But somehow it happened that she could not find her way back; she came to a high iron fence that surrounded the woods, but all her attempts to find the grated iron gate were useless. She ran this way and that; still no gate was to be seen. Then she heard the sound of a whistle at a distance, and exclaimed, in joy, 'I hear.a living sound; some one surely is in the wood who will show me the way.' She hastened through a thicker in the direction of the whistle, and suddenly beheld a scene which caused her great surprise. Before her lay a large green meadow, and beyond this a clear lake, on which a number of stately swams were swimming gracefully. In the middle of the lake was a small island, and upon it a grand palace, surrounded by flower gardens and orange groves. As she approached the shore of the lake, she saw a little man sitting there who did not look so friendly as the little hunter in the forest. He had a large head with rough hair, and a gray beard that reached down to his knees. In one hand he held a whistle, and in the other a switch. Delphine felt rather afraid to speak to him, and stood at a little distance. She soon discovered that his office was to take care of the swans, and prevent them from going out of the water. When any did so, he whistled to them, and if they did not obey him, then he employed his long switch, which had the property of stretching the palace; therefore she soon gained courage to say: 'Good frlend, can you show

'I have found what I sought,' answered Delfound what I sought, answered Delphine, but I pray you to let some one direct me in the way home, for I find that I have wandered in the wrong direction. Very well, replied the King, 'it shall be done; but it is the custom of all who enter this kingdom to give a present to the King of the Swans.—What hast thou to offer? 'Alas!' replied Delphine, I have nothing at all; iff I had known I would have brought something from home.' Thou hast strawberries, rejoined the King, 'and I like strawberries aboye all things. Give me thy strawberries, and then one of my servants will show thee thy way home.' 'Alas! I cannot give you all,' said Del-'Alas! I cannot give you all,' said Delphine; 'the strawberries are for my sick filend, who must die if she has no strawberries, but I will readily give you some strawberries with stems and reaves, and tied them into a bunch with the ribbon state bound her hair, and hallocarded to the King. 'Now go; this man will attend thee—do exactly what he desires.'

The old man with the gray beard waited for her, and when Delphine had taken leave of the King, he led her luto the garden, tied a fine handkerchief over her eyes, whistled, and at the same in stant took her by the arm. She heard the rustling of wings; she felt the wind blow colder and colder in her face, but was not conscious of moving, nor could she see anything. At last the sound of wings ceased, and the old man set her upon the ground.

'Now, my child, count twenty, then take off the bandage, but not before—Preserve it carefully; it will be required of thee at its proper time.'

She counted twenty, and when she had taken off the bandage she found herself standling on the hill, opposite the house of her friend Hilda, with frost and snow around. She looked up to the sky, and there saw a great bird and the old gray bearded man sitting upon it, with his arms around its neck. Then she hastened to her friend Hilda, who was still in bed, repeating the words: 'Who will bring me strawberries to make me well?'

There they are,' said Delphine, handing the bunch to Hilda. Every one was astonished, and wanted to know whence Delphine had brought them. Before she had told her wonderful adventures, Hilda had eaten all the strawberries. Then the color returned to her face, and Delphine had brought them. Beste san had told her wonderful adventures, Hilda had eaten all the strawberries. Then the color returned to her face, and strength to her limbs; and she said: Thank God, and dear Delphine, now I am quite well, rose up, and was really cured of her illness.

Who can say how the parents thanked Delphine? She was truly a good and brave girl, beloved by all, because she was not selfish, and was kind and thoughtful for others. One day, long after, as Delphine was walking in the meadows with her mother, talking of her marriage that was to be, she looked up and saw a black speck in the sky, which became larger as it descended, and at last they saw it was a prodigious black swan, and that it was flying down toward them. There was a tent with golden gauze curtains upon the swan's back, and when the swan had gently alighted on the ground, there came out of the tent a little.

ground, there came out of the tent a little man with friendly eyes—it was the King of the Swans. 'I have heard,' he said, 'that in a short 'I have heard,' he said, 'that in a short time thou wilt celebrate thy wedding with an honest, good man, and as thou gavest me a present when a child, and hast grown up so good, brave and pure a maiden, I will make thee a present in return.' So saying, he put a costly boquet in her hand; it was formed of gold leaves in the form of strawberry leaves, and the berries were large rubbies and amethyst, and the flowers were diamonds, pearls and opals.

'Take this as a reward for thy unselfishness, and thy tender love for thy olfobness and thy tender love for the mother and friends.' Delphine and he mother could hardly thank the King, in their astonishment. But he did not giv them time, for, pressing the hand of Delphine kindly, he bade her farewell. and, wishing her happiness in her new life, entered the tent, and the black swan rose majestically in the air and flew to-ward his home, and at last disappeared as a little spot in the clouds.

Many little boys and girls have gone over the hill since, in search of strawberries and the land of swans, but have not found them. Perhaps they were more selfish and not so good as Delphine.

THE USES OF PROSPERITY. Those who have risen to prosperity by steady industry and sagacity in obtaining money seldom part with that universally esteemed and valuable ruler of destiny without securing to themselves some fully adequate or superior reward for the so-called gift, which, in nine cases out of ten, is grudgingly bestowed, and which will in time call for its pound of flesh near the heart.

Prosperity proves a blessing or a curse to cursolves in proportion to the means Prosperity proves a blessing or a curse to ourselves in proportion to the means by which it has been secured and the manner in which it is employed. Some men rise with the occasion. If their wealth Increases, liberality expands their hearts and the stream of their benificence flows outward to deserving objects. Others become contracted and cramped by the desire for still greater gain; the more they accumulate the more thirsty do they grow for gold, and this consuming and devouring greed makes them ineffably mean in small things, while in more important matters their show of liberality and generosity is but quicksand, or a mirage, which cheats the unwary and substitutes bitter disgust for gratitude in the seeming recipients of their favor.

There are many cases of men who, having risen to affluence by hard and untiring industry, retain a strong feeling for those seeking to rise in the same way, and who are always ready to loud a balaine part there are many cases.

for those seeking to rise in the same way, and who are always ready to lend a helping hand to struggling merit. Such men, even if they are but few, cheer the hearts of many and stimulate the efforts of others who are cognizant of their liberality. Were there more of them in high places (wealth being regarded as the criterion of elevation) swayed by this same generous and liberal spirit, how many tears would be wiped from the eyes of the oppressed; how gladly would they exchange a feeling of injured pride and repulsive suspicion for one of unmingled admiration and gratitude, only ceasing with their lives.

In an examination made by Professor Marcet, of Geneva, of a long series of meteorological observations, made with reference to the influence of the moon on the weather, he found that the influence of the moon on the rain-fall must be regarded as nothing. On the question of changes of the weather, he found by calculation that the average probability of weather on any day is 0 120, that the probability of a change of weather on the day of full moon is 0.21, and new moon 0.25; for the day after new moon, 0.143. Both at new and full moon these changes were found to have been from foul to fair one hundred and six times where they were from fair to foul seventy-seven times. The conclusion arrived at by Bugeaud on this point was, that 11 times out of 12, the weather, during the whole moon, follows the weather of the fifth day of the moon, if on the sixth day, it remains as it was on the fifth; and nine times out of twelve it follows the fourth.

ONE MILLION OF LIVES SAVED It is one of the remarkable facts, of this remarkable age, not merely that so many person are the victims of dyspepsia or indigestion, but its willing victims. Now, we would not be un derstood to say that any one regards dyspepsia with favor, or feels, disposed to rank in among this 'numbers' or life. The 'trom' it.—Those who have experienced its forments would scout such an idea. All dread it, and would gladly dispense with its unpleasant familiarities. Mark Tapley who was jolly under all the trying circumstances in which he was placed, nover had an atlack of dyspepsia, or his follity would have speedily forsairen him. Men and women squettines suffer its tortures uncomplainingly, but whoever heard of a person who enjoyed them? Of all the mittifarious diseases to which the human system is liable, there is perhaps no one ogenerally provalent as dyspepsia. There are diseases more acute and painful, and which more frequently prove fatal, but none, the effects of which are so depressing to the halm and so positively distressing to the body. in our direction, and that we were de-barred from taking any part in it. I wished to climb the hill at my back, from which I thought I might obtain a view of the battle, but you had fixed my place with an order for me to remain there, and voice. I called him back.

'One word, Geuner, Be patient; do you understand? I order you to be prudent. There is no necessity of your being killed, for your death will not save France, or eradicate the disaster of Chattillon.

I was not a participant in the fighting that occurred on that day from L'Tay to Thials and Chevilly. I only saw the procession of wounded, and it was a most cruek sight. In the evening, I learned that Genner had distinguished himself, his coolness and intrepldity had been remarked, and he had been publicly complimented. General X——, who is an excellent judge of such matters, proposed to me to attach him definitely to his staff as a reward for his services. I sent this offer to Genner, who refused it.

Up to the 13th of October there occurred nothing of importance. On that day we received intelligence that the enemy was to be attacked between Bagneyx and Chatillon. A flash of joy illuminated the countenance of Genner.

'At last!' he exclaimed, with a look which expressed his hope.

The French troops were divided into three corps, without counting the reserve. One of our divisions received orders to march on Vanvres and Clamart, while another attacked from the front of Bagneux. As for us, we were detailed to operate between the other two, and to approach in the face of the position at Chatillon.

We were sustained by several battalions of the line, and a heavy artillery force and Mobiles, while my company

'Several hours, as it seemed to me, passed in this waiting. At different times I believed that I heard precipitate and confused sleps; then I fancied that I felt that trembling of the air which is produced by men in flight, and the idea of a retreat, a rout, passed like a cloud over my thoughts; but I had repressed the thought. Fly! French soldiers in flight! that could not be. Resides, the

There was once a young girl who was named Delphine, so good and cheerful that she was a favorite with everybody. The girl had a friend, called Hilda, who was also a very good child, and they loved each other dearly. In the winter, when the snow was lying deep upon the hill and field, Hilda fell siok, and her parents were in great trouble about her. She was quite unable to eat, was burning with fever heat and shivering with cold by urns; she became no better, though she had several doctors and a great deal of medicine.

When any of her young friends came to see her, she would say: 'Give mestrawberries; who will go and find mestrawberries; who will go and find mestrawberries, that I may get well again.' If her parents said: 'Dear Hilda, it is the winter, and there are no strawberries to be found at this season,' Hilda would raise herself up in bed, and say: 'Far away over the high hill there is a green slope; there I can see plenty of strawberries; who will go and fetch them for me? only one of the nice red berries—only one.' The children left the room, saying to each other: 'What nonsense poor Hilda talked about strawberries; she must be dreaming. Who would go up that wild hill, and through those dark woods to get strawberries for any one?' But Delphine felt troubled, and said: 'Who will go with me over the mountain to seek for strawberries? It will be some comfort to poor Hilda if she sees us start to seek them, even if we do not find.'—But no one would go with her, and all went straight home.

So Delphine set out alone on her way. A small trodden footpath led up the great steep hill and down again on the other side, through a great dark wood of beech and oak. She came to a place where three paths met; she stood still a minute, not knowing which path to take, when she saw a little man approaching through the trees. He had a green hat upon his head, with a feather as white as snow. His dress was of the softest swan's down; he carried an ivory bow on his shoulder, and a small silver hunting-horn hung at his side.

I shall be able to find something here she will like, and I hope I shall not return empty handed.
'Come with me,' said the little hunter;' I will show you a place where you will find what you have come in search of,'
He went on before, leading her through many winding paths, until the forest appeared much lighter, and the air became warmer and more senting-like, and at last warmer and more spring-like, and at last they came to a grated from door. The little man unlocked it, saying, 'If you go straight forward, you will find what you seek.'

snow me the way out of this forest in my way home?

The graybeard looked at her in surprise, but did not speak; he merely made her a sign that she should sit down, which she did. Then he whistled, and presently there came a large swan from the lake, and laid down before him. The little man seated himself on its back, throwing one arm around its neck, and away the trusty bird swam with him across the lake. There he alighted and went into the palace.

Delphine waited some time, curious to see what would happen; but she did not feel afraid. At length she saw four black swans swim from a creek running into the lake, harnessed to a beautiful little green boat, adorned with silver and prein a dream, the streets of a peaceful villege, a quiet mansion, two young giris, who stood together, who thought of their brother, who waited for him, and hoped to see him again. I would have willingly given all my happiness in this world to have saved this poor boy; to have taken into my own breast the three balls which had destroyed his life.

I do not know whether or not he heard some noise, or that he devined my presence, but he opened his eyes and recognized me.

'And Chatillon?' he asked, with a feverish and burning glance.

He did not know the result of the day, and hesitated to reply.

Genner, without a word of complaint, without a sigh, turned his head and closed his eyes.

the boat ended in the shape of a long swan's neck.

The greybeard sat there, looking much more agreeable than before. He gave Delphine a sign to step in. She complled. They then sailed gently across the lake, and as soon as they reached the shore, he handed her out of the boat, and led her to the castle.
