moist, from July 1st to August 15th. The land for celery must be rich and moist, or if not moist, at least deep and strong—such land, as will raise a good crop of onions. It loves drained meadows, well manured and worked fine. It is customary here to take a crop of potatoes, onlons, lettuce, cabbage or beets from the land before the celery crop; and if the celery is wanted for winter use, the whole land can be used for these early crops, and cleared and plowed in time for the celery crop. But if wanted for early use, the celery plants must be set early, say June 20th to 28th, and then blank rows are left for this purpose between the early crops,six or eight feet asunder. The land should be well manured in the spring for the early crops, and this will generally carry the celery crop through without any more manure; but it is thought that more manure is needed at planting time, it should be well decomposed and mixed with the soil, for celery is a plant very impatient of drouth, and if planted on rough ma-nure in the drill, would seldom thrive. The plants are set in rows six or eight feet apart, and one foot apart in the row; and unless the weather is moist, they will need watering for a few days after planting, until the roots take hold. If the plants get crowded in the bed before planting, shear them or mow them half way down. Keep the ground between the rows well cuitivated, and if the weather is very dry, roll the land after cultivating, which will prevent excessive evaporation and withering of the plants.

About four or six weeks before it is to be used, and not sooner, the process of earthing up begins; and here we need all the earth we can get between rows six to eight feet asunder in order to get good salable celery; what sort of celery they raise in New York, with rows three feet apart and plants eight inches in the row, may best be judegd by the prices: the New York celery has to be tied in bunches, and sells at 2½ cents per root, while the Boston celery, raised as above, is so large as to need no bunching, and sells at 8 to 12 cents per

The banking is done as follows: The land between the rows is plowed; then two men with long handled shovels stand, one at each side of the row, and throw the earth against the p while a third man gathers with his hands the spreading leaves and holds them compactly until the earth supports them. After growing a week or ten days, more earth must be banked up, and after a third or fourth banking, the celery is generally ready for maket. It can be taken up at any time when the ground is not frozen; we begin to sell a little in September, and clear the field, either by sale or storage, by Nov. 20th, after which we seldom have much open weather here.

Our mode of storage is different from any I have seen described. A place is selected where there is naturally good drainage; a pit is dug 24 feet wide, and as long as needed; the earth is thrown up in a bank around the pit so as to be 31 feet above the bottom of the pit, and wide enough to stand well all win-ter. A row of posts is driven into the ground along the centre of this pit, 4 feet apart, and a piece of 2 by four scantling spiked to the top of the posts, which should all be sawed off level, and at a proper height to form a ridge for the roof the pit. Two more rows of posts midway between the ridge and sides, with scantling attached, support the roof of boards. These boards must be covered with coarse litter (dried eelgrass from the seashore is best) thick enough to keep out frost in the severest weather, for latter being blanched the celery is much injured, by frost. In the bottom of this pit the celery is heeled in, as thick as it will stand. Care must be taken never to freeze it after it is taken from the ground, but it will keep better for being often opened and aired in fine weather. Celery will keep tolerably well if heeled in upon the floor of an ordinary cellar, cool enough to keep roots in good order, but of course no market gardener has cellar room enough for this; it is a convenient way for family supply.

HEAD CHEESE AND SAUSAGE.-For head cheese, take off the ears and nosee, and pick out the eyes; lay the heads in salt and water over night, then wash and put them (with the ears and skins) on to boil; boil till the bones come out easily. Season twenty pounds of meat with half a pound of salt, three heaping table spoonfuls of sage, three of pepper and two of thyme. For more or less meat, season accordingly. After seasoning; chop fine; pour the meat in milk pans, pack closely, and cover with paper greased with melted lard, and lastly cover with boards or plates. Hog's head chesse may be eaten cold, with or without vinegar, or fried as sausage meat, take all the clip-pings, a portion of fat, liver and heart? pings, a portion of fat, liver and hearty chop fine; previous to seasoning and packing. The number of pounds as advised for hog's head cheese is a good precedent as regards seasoning and packing. The middlings, if very fat, pay best when the lean parts are converted into sausage meat, the fat into lard, and the skins to increase the bulk of hog's head cheese. Previous to packing, fry a small portion of the meat to test the seasoning; if not satisfactory, it can be altered by adding more meat or increasing a portion of the seasoning.
